The reader, doubtless, will on this occasion be reminded of the Popish practice of auricular confession. For my own part I make no scruple to acknowledge that confession, as managed in the Church of Rome, is infinitely preferable to confession as conducted under the auspices of Mr. Wesley. In those countries where Popery is established, confession is made only to one person, and he a priest; who, if he divulges what is made known to him under the character of confessor, is liable by law to suffer death. But, in these Band Societies the most open and unreserved confession is, it seems, made in the hearing of a dozen or twenty old women and boys, who are at liberty to blab out all they hear, without being obnoxious to any penalty at all.

I shall only transcribe from the above account the two following rules imposed on these same societies:

1. "To wear no needless ornaments; such as rings, ear-rings, necklaces, lace, ruffles.

2. "To use no needless self-indulgencies; such as taking snuff or tobacco: unless prescribed by physicians."

chaplains of the then Russian ambassador here knew nothing about him : and that to this day, the Greek Church in Amsterdam believed him to have been an impostor. With regard to this person, I take the liberty of putting one or two queries to you.

1. Did you or did you not get him (m) to ordain several of your lay preachers according to the manner of what he called the Greek Ritual?

2. Did these lay preachers of yours, or did they not, both dress and officiate as clergymen of the Church of England, in consequence of that ordination? And under the sanction of your own avowed approbation? notwithstanding, putting matters at the best, they could only be ministers of the Greek Church, and which could give them no legal right to act as ministers of the Church of England. Nay, did you not repeatedly declare that their ordination was, to all intents and purposes, as valid as your own which you received forty years ago at Oxford?

3. Did you or did you not strongly press this supposed Greek bishop to consecrate you a bishop at large, that you might be invested with a power of ordaining what ministers you pleased to officiate in your societies as clergymen? And did he not refuse to consecrate you, alleging this for his reason, That according to the canons of the Greek Church more than one bishop must be present to assist at the consecration of a new one?

4. In all this, did you or did you not palpably violate a certain oath which you have repeatedly taken? I mean the oath of supremacy; part of which runs thus:

And I do declare, that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm: so help me God.

Now is not the conferring of orders an act of the highest ecclesiastical power and authority? And was not this man a foreigner? And were not the steps you took a positive acknowledgment of a foreign power and jurisdiction? And was not such acknowledgment a breach of your oath?

It matters not whether Erasmus was in fact an impostor or a genuine Greek bishop. Unless you were very insincere you took him to be what he passed for. If you did not, you were a party to a fraud. Either way, pretend no longer to love the Church of England! you who so lately endeavoured to set up imperium in imperio! If you are honest, you will either publicly confess your fault, or for ever throw aside your gown and cassock. You will either return to the service of the Church, or cease to wear her livery. You may think, perhaps, that I make too free in expostulating with you so plainly. And yet, on maturer thought, I question whether you may or not. How can Mr. Wesley, who on all occasions makes so very free with others, be angry with young translators for copying (though at humble distance) so venerable an example? Nor, indeed, ought a person who, beyond even what truth and decency permit, takes so great liberties with the rest of his contemporaries, to wonder if, so far as decency and truth allow, the rest of his contemporaries take as great liberties with him.

You complain, I am told, that the evangelical clergy are leaving no stone unturned "to raise John Calvin's ghost, in all quarters of the land." If you think the doctrines of that eminent and blessed reformer to be formidable as a ghost, you are welcome to do all you can towards laying them. Begin your incantations as soon as you please. The press is open, and you never had a fairer opportunity of trying your strength upon John Calvin than at present. Only take care that you do not, with all your skill in theological magic, get yourself into a circle, out of which you may find it difficult to retreat. And, a little to mitigate your wrath against

(m) There is something vastly curious in the letter of orders which this vagrant gave to the persons he pretended to ordain. I once saw an original letter or certificate of this kind, signed by himself. It was written in very mean Greek; and, which added to my persuasion of Erasmus's being an impostor, was drawn up, not in the modern Greek, which the Christians of that Church now use, but in the ancient; and, if I am not greatly mistaken, the words were likewise accented. I read it over twice, and most sincerely wish I had taken a copy of it: but at that time I regarded it only as an article of present curiosity. A friend of mine, however, who improved his opportunity rather better, took a translation of it, which on my after request, he favoured me with; and, upon the strength of memory I can venture to assure the public that the version is materially a just one. I believe it to be perfectly so. It runs thus:

"Our measure from the grace, gift and power of the all-holy and life-giving Spirit, given by our Saviour Jesus Christ to his divine and holy apostles, to ordain sub-deacons and deacons; and also to advance to the dignity of a priest! Of this grace which hath descended to our humility, I have ordained sub-deacon and deacon, at Snows-fields Chapel, on the 19th day of November, 1764, and at Wells-street Chapel, on the 24th of the same month, priest the reverend Mr. W. C. according to the rules of the holy apostles and of our faith. Moreover I have given to him power to minister and teach in all the world the gospel of Jesus Christ, no one forbidding him in the Church of God. Wherefore, for that very purpose, I have made this present letter of recommendation from our humility, and have given it to the ordained Mr. W. C. for his certificate and security.

"Given and written at London, in Britain, Nov. 24th, 1764.

"ERASMUS, bishop of ARCADIA."

I cannot help suspecting that his humility, as he styles himself, is, if the truth was known, nearly related to another certain old gentleman, who no less humbly writes himself servant of the servants of God. His humility of Arcadia, and his holiness of Rome, are, I doubt not, sons of one and the same ecclesiastical mother.

the raisers of Calvin's ghost, remember that you yourself have been a great ghost-raiser in your time. Who raised the ghosts of John Goodwin, the Arminian regicide; and of Thomas Grantham, the Arminian baptist? Who raised the ghost of Monsieur (n) De Renty, the French Papist; and of many other Romish enthusiasts; by translating their lives into English, for the edification of Protestant readers?

Should you take any notice of this letter, I have three requests to make; or rather, there are three particulars on which I have a right to insist:

1. Do not quote unfairly.
2. Do not answer evasively.
3. Do not print clandestinely.

Canvass the points of doctrine wherein we differ, as strictly as you can. They will stand the test. They scorn disguise. They disdain to sue for quarter. Truth, like our first parents in the state of innocence, can show herself naked, without being either afraid or ashamed: and he that doth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God.

May you at last begin to act from this principle, and no longer prostitute your time and talents to the wiredrawing of chicanery, and the circulation of error! I am not insensible of your parts: but alas! what is distinguished ability, if not wedded to integrity? No less just than ingenious is the remark of a learned and noble writer: "The riches of the mind, like those of fortune, may be employed so perversely as to become a nuisance and a pest, instead of an ornament and support to society." (o)

I am

Yours, &c.,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

Westminster,
March 26, 1770.

(n) As a specimen of Mr. Wesley's regard to, at least, the minutiae of Popery, I shall select a few passages from his Life of this Monsieur De Renty, which now lies before me. The reader will observe that the sentences inclosed with inverted commas are Mr. Wesley's own words.

He speaks favourably of this French Papist, for his regularly "saying the itinerarium," and then "singing the litanies of our Lord," before he set out on any journey; and for taking due care to "sing the vespers," while he was upon the road. Page 3. Among the instances of Monsieur's humility, are reckoned (page 9 and 10.) his "not permitting" a cushion to be carried for him "when he went to mass; and his frequent saying "his prayers at the outside of the Church." Also his going abroad, to visit a monastery "on foot," and that too "in thawing weather;" nay, he would sometimes "traverse in a manner all Paris," even when "it poured down with rain." And yet, with all this mad humility Mr. de Renty it seems kept a coach of his own. Had he been consistent he would have entirely shorn himself of this supernumerary convenience, by laying down his carriage. But then where would have been the merit of spontaneously traversing all Paris on foot when it poured down with rain? His dutiful demeanour to the priest who had the care of his soul, as its father confessor, is a feature of Mr. De Renty's saintship, on which Mr. Wesley, with peculiar rapture, dwells and dilates. Page 11. "A further proof of his humility was his carriage to his director. He did nothing that concerned himself without his conduct. To him he proposed whatever he designed either by speaking or writing, clearly and punctually; desiring his advice, his pleasure, and his blessing upon it: and that with the utmost respect and submission. And, without reply or disputing, he simply and exactly followed his order." This was good Catholic obedience indeed! and no doubt Mr. Wesley had a view in proposing such an example to the imitation of his Protestant followers. Under the article of De Renty's "Self-denial and mortification," we are informed (page 14.) that "he made but one meal a day for several years," and "always of the worst" provisions he could meet with. He would "often step into a baker's shop" and dine on "a piece of bread and a draught of water." From the same principle of gloomy and unthankful superstition, he would do penance, by "passing the night in a chair," or lying down in his "cloaths and boots," or sleeping "on a bench till morning." Being at Pontois "in winter" he desired "the Carmelite nuns not to make a fire, or prepare a bed" for him. He parted with several books (p. 16.) because they were "richly bound." He "used no gloves in any season; wore no clothes, but plain and close made;" and carried no silver in his pockets, "except for charity." After which detail of austerities, the biographer gravely adds, "I have seen him in his coach with a page and footman." His coach I presume was to carry him on foot when it rained; his page was to hold up his clothes which were plain and close made; and the office of the footman was to reach him his gloves, whereof he wore none in any season. Who could ever have surmised that such a doleful series of mortification and self-denial would end in the topperies of a coach, a page, and a footman! Mr. De Renty's vanity, which mixed itself with his very austerities, reminds me of what I am told is common in the streets of Paris: where you may see many a blind beggar bawling for alms, in a bag-wig, his hat under his arm, a wooden sword by his side, and paper ruffles adorning the hand that is extended to receive charity. But to return to the hero of the tale. Having had a quarrel with his mother, and the breach being made up, "he was no sooner returned home than he caused Te Deum to be sung," page 24. "He had great respect to holy persons, especially to priests. Whenever he met them, he saluted them with profound humility; and in his travels would alight off his horse to do it," page 33. Nor does Mr. Wesley omit to inform us, p. 39, of Mr. De Renty's regard to such fugitive Papists as had either rendered themselves obnoxious to the laws at home, or preferred begging in France to living under an heretical government in Great Britain. "He was the first that motioned some relief to the poor English, driven by persecution out of their own country." Nor must his very pilgrimages be overlooked. "Going one day to visit the holy place of Montmatre, after his prayers said in the Church, he retired into a desolate part of the mountain, near a little spring. There he kneeled down to prayer: and, that ended, he dined on a piece of bread and a draught of water." Page 45. Would it not have been still more devout not to have dined at all on such holy ground? "One day he visited a person who, from a groundless suspicion, had cruelly used his wife. Mr. De Renty accosted him with such soft language that he was persuaded at length to go to confession, which he had not done in twelve years before." P. 47, 48. Himself, says Mr. Wesley, speaking of Mr. De Renty's last illness, "made his confession almost every day till his death." Page 62.

I dismiss these and many other passages in this obnoxious performance without further remark. Their tendency is self-evident. I shall only add, that, if the reader has a desire to see still more enormous instances of Romish superstition and fanaticism, he will find them in Mr. Wesley's lives of some Spanish Monks (who, more nationally grave, did not imitate the French Ascetic, by retaining their coaches, pages, and footmen), in the last volume, or last but one, of his compilation entitled The Christian Library.

(o) Dialogues of the Dead. p. 197. Edit. 1765

A WORD TO THE REVEREND
MR. WALTER SELLON.

LATELY TRANSPLANTED FROM THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF ASHBY DE LA ZOUCH TO SOME PART OF YORKSHIRE.

Owing to your transplantation above mentioned, I am ignorant of your present place of abode, and must therefore direct to you at large.—I have obtained a sight of your late Strictures on Mr. Elisha Coles, just time enough to save the press. These Strictures are, it seems, the joint progeny of Mr. Wesley and yourself: a par nobile fratrum, whose united labours have been exerted for several years last past, in scraping together and licking into form the materials of this long-threatened fulmination. Consequently, whoever may deem it worth his while to encounter the cub, will have the additional satisfaction of stringing the two parental brothers at one and the same time.

For my own part, I assure you, sir, in particular, whose name adorns the direction of this postscript, that I should have left you in peaceable possession of your absolute insignificance, had not the last page of your preface induced me to coincide with your apparent wish, by lending you my hand to lift you from your painful obscurity. How much credit you may gain by this my act of indulgence, and what figure you may make in the course of the exhibition, time will probably give you to feel. At present I have only room to observe that, in the aforesaid preface (which the style demonstrates to be all your own), you vibrate your Lilliputian spear at me; and give me to understand that I am next upon the list of those who are to feel the weight of your broken bulrush. I have published, you tell me, a "curious performance" concerning predestination; which said curious performance has, I hereby find, raised the bristles of a very curious adversary, who is so polite as to inform me that I am a Malmesbury Hobbist, a blasphemer, and a vile slanderer. Convenient names which dulness is never at a loss for,

When fancy flags and sense is at a stand.

So much for the rhetorical flowers with which the gentle prefacer crowns the brow of his imaginary victim. But the present chaplet is, it seems, only the sample of a whole garland to come. I am to be made "the subject of another piece;" wherein I am to be drubbed ex professo; that is to say, "Unless it be done by some abler hand, which," adds my hero, "I could wish to see." The plain English of this is, Mr. John Wesley's mastiff (who now only snarls) will actually bark at the mischievous vicar of Broad Hembury, unless Mr. John himself, the mastiff's owner, saves his poor cur the trouble by roaring in propria persona.

I must, however, inform them both, to their no small discomfort, that let them roar ever so loud, and ever so long; be it a solo, or be it a duetto; they will not rob the naughty vicar of one moment's repose; though they may, perhaps render it proper for him to repeat his trespasses on the public condescension.

A. T.

BROAD HEMBURY; Feb. 9, 1771.

MORE WORK FOR MR. JOHN WESLEY;

OR

A VINDICATION OF THE DECREES AND PROVIDENCE OF GOD,

FROM THE DEFAMATION OF A LATE PRINTED PAPER,

ENTITLED

"THE CONSEQUENCE PROVED."

Conflatur invidia falsa interpretatione sententiæ, quæ infamanda suscipitur—Non modò invidiosissimè exponuntur ipsa dogmata, sed et consecraria invidiosa ex his deducuntur.—Hæc sunt potissimæ artes, quibus invidia movetur—Visne probare infirmas esse illum ratiocinationes? Contraria a veritatem perspicue exponito et validis argumentis firmato.

LE CLERE, de Arg. Theol. ab. Inv. duct.

What in me is dark,

Illumine!

That, to the height of this great argument,

I may assert eternal providence,

And justify the ways of God to men. MILTON.

ADVERTISEMENT.

I EXPECT that this publication will, as usual, be followed by a succession of penny and two-penny squibs. Probably I shall take no notice of them. Mr. Wesley, it seems, has between two and three hundred lay-preachers in his connection. Their name is legion for they are many. It is impossible therefore, from their multitude, that they and their leader should not have the last word, if they are so determined. The latter has lately declared in print that he has been "fighting about words for almost these thirty years."

Doubtless, therefore, the last word must, in his estimation, be particularly worth fighting for. And (unless he should publish any thing at all to the purpose) the last word he is welcome to have. A man would have a hopeful task of it who should waste his life-time in playing at see-saw with almost three hundred such wise and genteel antagonists,

Who then talk most when least they have to say :

and some of whom have already shewn themselves unworthy of even being pilloried in a preface, or flogged at a pamphlet's end.

To those who know me not, it may seem needless to declare that, much as I disapprove Mr. Wesley's distinguishing principles, and the low cunning with which he circulates them, I still bear not the least ill-will to his person. As an individual, I wish him well, both here and ever. As a reviler, he lies (in a way of argument) at the mercy of those he defames. I make, however, no scruple to acknowledge that the manuscript of the following sheets has lain by me some weeks, merely with a view of striking out from time to time, whatever might savour of undue asperity and intemperate warmth. If I any where, however, express myself strongly, it is owing to the necessity I was under of exposing Mr. Wesley's unmanly and dishonest methods of attack.

BROAD HENBURY, NOV. 28, 1771.

MORE WORK

FOR

MR. JOHN WESLEY, &c.

If it be possible, says the apostle, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men : plainly intimating that in some cases this is not possible. For what if other men will not live peaceably with us ? what if some, like the troubled sea which cannot rest, are perpetually casting up mire and dirt against the gospel of God, and against all that embrace it ? Are such indefatigable slanderers to be let alone ? The apostle's own conduct says No. His unavoidable contests with the false teachers of that age are demonstrative of the necessity which, occasionally, even the meek and the pacific are under, of sharply rebuking such : to the end that, if God so please, they may become sound in the faith ; or, at least, learn not to blaspheme, nor to increase unto more ungodliness.

Our civil constitution is not more the envy of neighbouring nations, than our religious establishment is the eye-sore of Papists, Pelagians, and Arminians : (p) a tripartite, who too well agree in one. From the first settlement of our national Church, quite down to the present hour, it has been the ambition and the labour of those (q) factions to destroy her either by sap or by storm : and, when both these methods have miscarried, to adulterate and discolour the pure and undefiled system which they found themselves unable to overthrow.

Common justice commands me to acknowledge that no man has striven more to distinguish himself in this illaudable warfare than Mr. John Wesley. and at the same time, stubborn fact constrains me to add that few warriors have acquitted themselves more contemptibly. This gentleman, in his plenitude of ardour for the cause, has made long, ample, and repeated trial of all the three methods above mentioned : the silent sap, the vigorous assault, and the artful adulteration. But all without success. The mine will not spring. The assault cannot be carried. The adulteration is too gross to incorporate. What must he do ? Prevail he cannot : to fly he is ashamed. In such an exigence, all that remains for him is to flourish his reed, to throw an occasional squib, and scorn to confess either the impiety or the impracticability of his enterprise. But reeds are still unable to batter Churches, and squibs (such as "The Consequence proved") are only calculated to amuse children and terrify old women. Yet he goes on to throw the one and to brand-

(p) Observe, I speak not of all Arminians. Many there are, who, notwithstanding their entanglement in that net, stand entitled to the character of pious, moderate, respectable men. Of these I myself know more than a few : and have the happiness to enjoy as much of their esteem, as they deservedly possess of mine. But I speak above of the noisy, factious, malevolent Arminians : restless bigots, whose false fire would shed disgrace on whatever party they might belong to. Who, not content with exercising their own right of private judgment, are for reviling and condemning every individual person who claims the same right of judging for himself, and will not sacrifice his creed at their shrine.

(q) I am fully aware that it is impossible for the Arminians, strictly so called, to be charged with opposing our national system from its first institution : seeing they had then no more than a virtual existence in the loins of their ancestors. Even Mr. Wesley is forced to acknowledge (in a paper misentitled The Question, What is an Arminian? Answered : p. 4.) that Arminius himself did not "Begin to doubt of the principles which he had till then received" [i. e. Arminius did not begin to apostatize from Calvinism] until the year 1591. However, let his "doubts" have "began" when they would : I cannot find that he made any conspicuous figure, as an innovator on the Protestant faith, until about the year 1602. Consequently his English proselytes could not have laboured to subvert the religion of their country, so early as under Edward VI., nor even during the first years of Elizabeth. The Arminians, though at present a numerous, are very far from being an ancient, family. But as ever since they did spring up they have left no nerve unstrained in their attempts to demolish our doctrinal establishment : I have above consigned them, without scruple, to rank with the other two denominations there mentioned : an honour to which they have the fairer title, as they eminently promote the same good old cause, and so sedulously endeavour to make up in zeal what they want in antiquity.

dish the other : why? because his hatred of the heavenly doctrines is total; and he resolves that its perseverance shall be final. May divine grace, in mercy to his soul, supersede the former and forbid the latter!

The adventurer who embarks on such an expedition as that which has hitherto engrossed the attention of Mr. Wesley, should be prudent as well as daring. He has, I acknowledge, as much of the insidious in his composition as he has of the acid: and it would be difficult to say which predominates. But cunning is one thing, discretion is another. A few seeming grains of certain virtues, called humility and moderation, would have conducted in some measure to promote his views by screening them. The example of Arminius might have taught him this piece of theological policy, so needful in the ringleader of a sect. To give that erroneous Dutchman [Arminius] his due, he either had, or appeared to have, some remains of modesty and candour; which, more than all his arguments, contributed to his acquisition of disciples. But Mr. Wesley is for adding the lion to the fox. He wishes not only to wheedle, but to thunder the Church out of her Calvinism. Partly perhaps in resentment for his having been (very deservedly) thundered out of the Church. A deliverance, by the bye, on which I most heartily congratulate our sacred mother. And I believe her genuine sons may be safely confident (notwithstanding the late transactions at the Feathers Tavern), that she will not dispense with subscriptions to her Calvinism quite so complacently as she resigned Mr. John Wesley.

The complacency, however, is far from reciprocal. This discarded divine, like some discarded soldiers, cannot wholly divest himself of that military air which, under such circumstances, can, at best, but excite pity, instead of commanding respect. He is still, like Mahomet, for propagating his religion by the sword. Peals of anathemas are issued, and torrents of the lowest calumny are thrown out against all who abide by the doctrines of the xxxix articles. The gentleman's own is expected to carry all the efficacy of demonstration on penalty of his utmost malediction. But, let me tell him that the thinking part of mankind, especially those of them whose eyes are spiritually opened, will pay no more regard to his empty fulminations, though launched, quasi à tripode, with all the assumed importance of oracular infallibility; than our magnanimous Elizabeth paid to the bloated menaces of pope Pius V. He continued to roar, and she continued to reign. Pope John's authority may have some weight with such men as Messieurs Walter Sellon, Haddon Smith and Thomas Olivers: but not an inch beyond the purlieu of ignorance, prejudice, and superstition, will his dictatorship extend.

Sic volo, sic jubeo; stet, pro ratione, voluntas!

Such of the public as have condescended to peruse a pamphlet entitled, A Letter to the Rev. Mr. John Wesley, relative to his pretended Abridgment of Zanchius on Predestination, must be sufficiently apprized of the nature and occasion of my contest with this veteran. Another edition of that letter having been called for, and published last winter, the veteran aforesaid, by way (or rather, in lieu) of reprisal, prints, in the month of August, 1771, another paper, folded and priced as usual, twelve pages for a penny; seeing, of the twelve pages no more than nine are filled: which every reader, competently skilled in arithmetic, will grant are but three fourths of the dozen. Besides, it was piously and disinterestedly written as a therapeutic, to retrieve the erroneous; and as a prophylactic, to preserve the orthodox. Of course the cheaper the antidote, the more extensive; and the more extensive the more useful. But Mr. Wesley feels the force of the argumentum ad crumenam too deeply to vend his remedies at a rate so nicely conscientious. He had last year, if we may take his own word for it, near 30,000 followers. And supposing each follower (as, to be sure, each is in duty bound) to buy one, at least, of these penny papers, the farthing extraordinary amounts, in the whole, to thirty pounds, fourteen shillings. A sum of whose value saints of his complexion are as devoutly sensible as other men. Poor Robin's Almanack, alas! though twice as valuable, goes but for half the price of "The Consequence proved."

Let us now bring these nine pages to the test. Their title claims our first attention: "The Consequence proved." What consequence? even this! that, upon the scriptural and Church of England principle of predestination to life, it "naturally and necessarily follows that one in twenty, suppose of mankind, are elected; nineteen in twenty are reprobated; that the elect shall be saved do what they will; the reprobate shall be damned do what they can." These diabolical positions, enough to chill every reasonable and religious man with horror, are Mr. Wesley's own offspring, both as to sentiment and language. He had indeed, the matchless effrontery to publish them originally as mine: and, to render the audacious forgery complete, closed all with these words, "Reader believe this, or be damned: witness my hand, A. T." Now whence came it, that this concluding case was omitted in "The Consequence proved?" Was it because Mr. W. found himself ashamed to repeat so unparalleled a falsehood? I apprehend not. For aught appears, he is still as dead to the feelings of shame as he is blind to the doctrines of God. The reason, probably, was his utter despair of being able to torture a line of Zanchius into any thing like proof of my obtruding the doctrine of election upon pain of damnation: and he might well despair of this. Whom do I condemn? whom do I impiously consign to future punishment? I condemn no man. I dare not pronounce concerning any man's eternal state. Herein I judge not even Mr. Wesley himself: though I must tell him that if it be (as I most sincerely wish it may) the divine will to save him, he has an exceeding strait gate to pass through before he gets to heaven. In the meanwhile I return to "The Consequence proved."

The very title is inaccurate. The inferences which the writer pretends to deduce are not a consequence, but a chain of consequences. Let us see whether this mighty consequence-drawer is able to support the consequences drawn.

The proof opens thus:—"Mr. Toplady, a young, bold man, lately" [i. e. very nigh two years ago] "published a pamphlet, an extract from which was soon after" [i. e. about four months after] "printed, concluding with these words,—the sum of all is this: one in twenty (suppose) of mankind, &c."

Mr. W.'s present mode of phraseology is as pregnant with craft as his conduct is destitute of honour. Observe: "an extract from which," i. e. from which pamphlet: "concluding with these words—" Now would not any indifferent reader still imagine, that "those concluding words" were actually "extracted" from the "pamphlet" itself? And yet nothing can be wider from the fact. The "words," which he insinuates to have been "extracted," were not extracted from the pamphlet, but spun from his own daring invention. What shall we say of a man who first hatches blasphemy, and then fathers it on others? Nay, who adds crime to crime, by indirectly persisting in the falsehood, even after the falsehood has been detected and publicly exposed? His forehead must be petrified, and quite impervious to a blush.

The person who, in private conversation, utters a designed untruth, is deservedly branded with disgrace. But the man who sits down and deliberately writes a known, wilful, palpable lie to the public, may, it seems, still be "a saint," and "a precious labourer in the Lord's vineyard!" Away with such "saintship," away with such "precious labours."—Again: the man who forges my name in order to obtain a trifling sum of money is deemed guilty of a capital offence. But the man who subjoins my name to (r) blasphemous propositions of his own coining is to be treated as "an ancient, venerable servant of Christ, whose whole life has been devoted to the glory of God and the good of souls!" If all his "ancient services" were of a similar cast, even Arminianism itself must expunge them from the list of those good works which it supposes to be meritorious of salvation. Unless Mr. Wesley's Arminianism coincide with the Popish maxim, that bad works, if done to heretics, are transubstantiated into good ones.

But there are two charges alleged against me to which I shall assign a moment's attention: because, though pitifully frivolous, they are nevertheless somewhat curious and uncommon. I am it seems, "young," and "bold." To the first, I in part plead guilty. I have been but between nine and ten years in orders, though ordained as soon as my age would permit.—The merits of the second allegation I leave to the decision of others. However, let me be as "bold" as I will, I cannot be bold in a better cause. Was I even as bold as a lion, it would, according to the maxim of a very wise writer, be a mark, not of perverseness, but of righteousness. (s) The apostle tacitly commends a prophet for being not only bold, but very bold, in asserting the sovereignty, efficacy, and freeness of divine grace in opposition to the merits and free-will of man: Isaiah is very bold, and saith concerning God, I was found of them that sought me not, I was made manifest to them that asked not after me. (t) When the opposers of the Christian system are shameless, why should its defenders be spiritless? As to my inconsiderable self, I blush not to tread in the steps of one, to whose faith I subscribe from the utmost of my heart. If the apostle Paul, with his whole assemblage of gifts and graces (such as probably never shone before, nor will shine again in any mere man, while the world endures), could request the prayers of God's people; much more may I, the weakest of the weak, and the unworthiest of the unworthy, supplicate the intercession of those who love the truth, and entreat them to pray, on my behalf, that utterance may be given to me, that I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery of the gospel; that therein I may speak (and why not write?) boldly, as I ought to speak. (u)

(r) This epithet is not too strong. To say that any shall be saved, do what they will, and others damned, do what they can; is, in the first instance, blasphemy against the holiness of God, and in the second, blasphemy against the holiness of man.

(s) Prov. xxviii. 1. (t) Rom. x. 29. (u) Eph. vi. 19, 20.

After all, the charge of boldness (in the sense Mr. Wesley uses the term) comes more than a little out of character from his pen. I could never have dreamed of such an indictment from such a plaintiff. Had I publicly distorted and defamed the decrees of God; had I moreover advanced so many miles beyond boldness as to lay those distortions and defamations at the door of another; bold as I am affirmed to be, I could never have looked up afterwards. I should have thought every miscreant I met an honest man than myself. But Mr. John seems a perfect stranger to these feelings. His murus athenicus has been too long transferred from his conscience to his forehead. On the whole, could I descend so exceedingly low as to retaliate on this writer in his own way, I should thus return the compliment in kind: Mr. John Wesley, an old audacious man, lately published,———But I neither will nor can adopt his scurrility. I had rather let the ancient offender pass unchastised than soil my hands in the operation. I proceed therefore to his next paragraph.

“A great outcry has been raised on that account” [viz. on account of the lying extract from Zanchy, and on account of the blasphemous inferences and the forgery thereto annexed]: “A great outcry has been raised on that account” [it should have run on those accounts], “as though this was not a fair state of the case; and it has been vehemently affirmed that no such consequence follows from the doctrine of absolute predestination. I calmly affirm it is a fair state of the case. This consequence” [a mistake again for these consequences] “does” [another mistake for do] “naturally and necessarily follow from the doctrine of absolute predestination, as here” [it should be there] “stated and defended by bold Mr. Augustus Toj lady.” Thus far the honest and accurate Mr. Wesley. On the other hand bold Mr. Augustus no less “calmly affirms,” that the “great outcry,” at which bold Mr. John cries out was most justly raised against the said John; who by his deep-laid, but soon detected, cunning, by his avowed vacuity of of candour, truth and shame, hath in the general estimation of all unprejudiced people, whether serious or profligate (the most respectable of the Arminian party themselves not excepted), gotten a wound and dishonour and a reproach which all his whining and winding sophistry will never be able to wipe away.

With the same determined calmness, I do also affirm that his mode of stating the important controversy concerning predestination is so far from “fair,” that it has nothing at all to do with the subject: but was invented, and adopted, merely to disclose the true state of the question, and to spread a mist before the eyes of such superstitious persons as might be disposed to take matters on the word of Mr. John. Which sort of readers, by the way, have, to that gentleman's no small disappointment and mortification, proved abundantly fewer than he wished and expected.

He goes on: “Indeed, I have not leisure to consider the matter at large.” Then why did he dabble in it at all? A chain of principles, like those termed Calvinistic, each successive link of which depends on the foregoing till you arrive at the first, indispensably requires a consideration “at large.” A partial view of the subject is equivalent to none. A disjointed, unconnected heap of doctrines, like that espoused by this man of no leisure; a farrago of opinions made up of incoherent shreds; may, indeed, be considered by scraps, without any injury to the whole. It is just the same, where you begin, and which you take. But there is a harmony, there is a correlative dependency, in the system of grace: and, not to advert to these, resembles transposing the notes in some capital piece of music. Mr. Wesley, therefore, must either find “leisure to consider the matter at large;” or they who have so considered it will, with equal certainty and justice, set him down for a pitiful nibbler at the file he cannot bite.

The truth is, he has jumped hand over head into an engagement, the progress of which does not answer his expectation. Hence his willingness to quit the field—for want of leisure: but, in fact, for want of success. And who must cover his retreat, but the heroic Thomas Oliver, alas Olivers? And who is this redoubtable Thomas? Truly, neither more nor less than a journeyman shoemaker, now retained by Mr. Wesley as a lay-preacher, at the rate of ten pounds per annum: which, I suppose, Thomas prefers to earning double the sum by working at his proper trade.

Pharaoh's remark, though malicious and untrue in its original application, is not always unjust: Ye are idle, ye are idle; therefore ye say, Let us go from our honest employs and pretend to serve the Lord. But the rougher the foal, the sleeker the ass. The idle shoemaker is, to give him his due, a very laborious Arminian. Though revolted, in some respect, from the gentle craft of St. Crispin, his genius hath constant employ and very ample scope for exertion in following the boisterous craft of Mr. John Wesley, to whom he, moreover, stands related as bully in chief; in chief did I say? I had forgot the Rev. Mr. Walter Sellor Prunella claims precedence of leather Thomas is only second in commission.

But seems it not rather strange that Mr. Wesley, a man of education, and who has given proof upon proof that he is indued with a very competent portion of assurance should not be ashamed to skulk for shelter under a cobbler's apron? The Jews will by no means work on the sabbath; but they set Gentiles to work without scruple. Mr. John affects to decline undertaking the argument in form: and the cobbler (still doomed to be an under-strapper) is delegated to supply Mr. John's lack of leisure as well as of leather. Already has the journeyman made an effort (with some of Mr. John's own assistance) to white-wash the said Mr. John. He might as well have laboured to blanch the Æthiop or to emaculate the leopard. But how can Robin Hood be better employed, than in standing up for Little John? It must be granted that Little John appears something taller on the shoulders of his man. I acknowledge, too, that there is upon the whole, some proportionable congruity between the pedestal and the image. Yet this mode of exhibition is not without its danger. I once saw, when a boy, a rope-dancer parading round May-fair on the shoulders of a booth-keeper. For some time the carrier and the carried engrossed the acclamations of the wondering populace. When, alas! either by a stumble of the elevator, or through defect of equilibrium in the elevatee, down came the latter; who, after such dishonour, was glad to trudge it back on foot, instead of venturing to re-ascend the living pedestal. Should the above illustration be deemed not sufficiently sublime for so towering a subject; take another from the pen of a late nobleman. "I remember," says his lordship, "to have seen a" [Popish] "procession at Aix la Chapelle, wherein an image of Charlemagne is carried on the shoulders of a man who is hid by the long robe of the imperial saint. Follow him into the vestry, you see the bearer slip from under the robe and the gigantic figure dwindles into an image of the ordinary size, and is set by among other lumber (x)."

The case in reality stands thus. The master does me an injury, by subjoining my name to what I never wrote. On which I publicly call the aggressor himself to account. The aggressor slinks behind one of his drudges, who says, "Fight me in my master's stead." I answer, No. Ne sutor ultra crepidam. What hast thou to do with controversy? Away to thy stall and leave Little John to fight his own battles. My business is not with the man, but with the master. I most certainly (at least in my present view of things) shall never descend to uncase that hog in armour. This Mr. Wesley could not but foresee. He therefore did shrewdly, to slip his own neck out of the collar, and thrust in that of a man who may strut with the collar on his neck, unnoticed and unmolested, till his dying day.

After all, let us see whether Mr. Wesley has extricated his own neck with any degree of dexterity. In order to this, we must examine whether the consequences, which he labours to squeeze from the doctrine of predestination, as stated by me, will stand.

1. The first pretended consequence was that "one in twenty, suppose, of mankind is elected; nineteen in twenty are reprobated." Mr. W. seems at present to give up this abominable inference. He does not so much as attempt to prove it in the paper now under examination. Which paper, therefore does not even, in appearance, answer its title. This consequence at least is not proved. Nay, it is thrown by and smothered in silence. Nor do I wonder at it. I should, indeed, be surprised to find even Mr. Wesley's own writings (and surely if they cannot, nothing can) put him out of countenance. But he had a motive not at all related to shame, for slipping that infamous paragraph out of sight. The credit of his perspicacity as a reasoner absolutely required it. For could any thing be more palpably absurd than to charge us with a peremptory consequence, affirmed to be drawn from absolute premises, which said peremptory consequence was (even in terminis) confessedly hypothetic, and founded on a mere vague supposition? The word "suppose" is the basis of the whole conclusion. But we never did, nor can "suppose" that no more than "one in twenty" is elected. Therefore the basis melts, and the entire consequential fabric (like the rope dancer at May-fair) tumbles to the ground.

Observe, reader, for it is worth thy while, how suddenly Mr. Wesley's polemical weather-glass rises and falls. In his printed letter to the late truly reverend and amiable Mr. Hervey, he charged that incomparable man, and the Calvinistic party in general, with holding the reprobation of "nine out of ten (y)." In March, 1770, we were charged with holding as above, that "nineteen in twenty are reprobated (z)." In February 1771, we were charged with holding the reprobation of "forty-nine out of fifty (a)." And now, about five months after, the glass is sunk 30 degrees lower, and in "The Consequence proved," stands again at "nineteen out of twenty." Next spring I suppose it will rise to ninety-nine out of a hundred. A very capable gentleman this to ascertain the number of the elect and reprobate, who reprobates his own

(x) See Pope's Works, vol. ix. letter 45.

(y) See Wesley's Preservative, p. 235.

(z) See Wesley's pretended Abridgment of Zanebims, p. 12.

(a) See a Scurrilous Letter, signed John Wesley, in Lloyd's Evening Post, for Friday, March 1 1771.

calculations almost as often as the clock strikes!—So much for the first consequence. Now for the second :

II. "The elect shall be saved, do what they will." By doing "what they will," is evidently meant be they finally ever so unholy, and be their lives ever so immoral. The expression must signify this, or it can signify nothing. It is either a paltry sophistical quibble upon the word will, and so evaporates into a term without a fixed idea, or it imports that, upon the footing of absolute election, personal sanctification and practical obedience are unnecessary to salvation.

The point of enquiry, then is, Whether the elect themselves can be ultimately saved without being previously sanctified by inherent grace, and (if adult) without evidencing that sanctification (according as ability and opportunity are given), by walking in the way of God's commandments? I affirm, with Scripture, that they cannot be saved without sanctification and obedience. Yet is not their salvation at all precarious: for that very decree of election by which they were nominated and ordained to eternal life, ordained their intermediate renewal after the image of God, in righteousness and true holiness. Nay, that renewal is itself the dawn and beginning of actual salvation: This is life eternal, to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent (b). Whence the apostle; By grace ye are saved, through faith (c). And again, Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling (d). Sanctity, therefore, of heart and life is not barely a prelude to, but even a part and initiatory anticipation of, the glory which shall be revealed.

The elect could no more be saved without personal holiness than they could be saved without personal existence. And why? because God's own decree secures the means as well as the end, and accomplishes the end by the means. The same gratuitous predestination which ordained the existence of the elect as men ordained their purification as saints: and they were ordained to both, in order to their being finally and completely saved in Jesus Christ with eternal glory.

The doctrine of election is a doctrine of mere revelation. Though human reason, when defecated from prejudice and sanctified by grace, cannot but assent to it as a scripture truth; yet reason would probably never have discovered it with certainty and clearness had not God expressly made it known in his written word. Consequently from that written word we are to learn the true nature and effects of electing grace: since God himself must be best acquainted with his own decrees.

The Holy Spirit, making the apostle's pen the channel of unerring inspiration, thus inspired him to write: According as he [God the Father] hath chosen us in him [in Christ] before the foundation of the world, that we should [not "be saved do what we will;" but] be holy and without blame before him in love. Eph. i. 4.—Election is always followed by regeneration: and regeneration is the source of all good works: whence the apostle adds, in the very next chapter, v. 10, We [the elect] are his [subsequent] workmanship, created [anew] in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath fore-ordained that we should walk in them. Consequently it does not follow from the doctrine of absolute predestination that "the elect shall be saved do what they will." On the contrary, they are chosen as much to holiness as to heaven; and are fore-ordained to walk in good works, by virtue of their election from eternity and of their conversion in time. Yet again: God hath from the beginning [i. e. from everlasting; see Prov. viii. 23. 1 John i. 1, 2.] chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the spirit and belief of the truth: 2 Thess. ii. 13. All therefore who are chosen to salvation are no less unalterably destined to holiness and faith in the mean while. And if so, it is giving God himself the lie to say that "the elect shall be saved do what they will." For the elect, like the blessed Person who redeemed them, come into the world not to do their own will, but the will of him that sent them: and this is the will of God concerning them, even their sanctification: 1 Thess. iv. 3. Hence they are expressly said to be elect—unto obedience (e): not indeed, chosen because of obedience, but chosen unto it: for works are not the fountain of grace, but streams flowing from it. Election does not depend upon holiness, but holiness depends upon election. So far therefore is predestination from being subversive of good works, that predestination is the primary cause of all the good works which have been and shall be wrought from the beginning to the end of time. It is only the peculiar people that are truly zealous of good works, Tit. ii. 14. The rest may profess that they know God, but even amidst all their noise about works, in their own works they deny him; being abominable and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate: Tit. i. 16. As I have elsewhere observed, they trust in good works, without doing them; while the peculiar people do good works without trusting in them.

Reason also joins with Scripture, in asserting the indispensable necessity of sanctification, upon the footing of the most ab-

(b) John xvii. 3.

(c) Eph. ii. 8.

(d) 2 Tim. i. 9.

(e) 1 Pet. i. 2.

solute and irrespective election : or, in other words that the certainty of the end does not supersede, but ensure, the intervention of the means. It was decreed that Abraham should be a father of many nations. According to Mr. Wesley's mode of argumentation, Abraham might have been so, though he died in infancy. I say No. For the same purpose of God which appointed him to be a father of Nations appointed also (as a mean to the end) that he should live to a competent age.—St. Paul was decreed to preach the gospel before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel (f). Ergò, says an Arminian, Paul might have preached in various nations without travelling a step, and without so much as opening his lips. I deny the consequence. Paul's travelling, and Paul's utterance, were as certainly and as necessarily included in the decree of the means as his preaching was determined by the decree of the end.—God resolved that Hezekiah should live fifteen years longer than Hezekiah expected. Hezekiah might therefore, according to Mr. Wesley's plan, have argued thus: "God has promised me fifteen years of life to come. Ergò, Live I shall, do what I will: die I shall not, do what I can. I will therefore neither eat, drink nor sleep. Nay, I will tie a millstone round my neck and throw myself headlong into the sea, from the highest precipice I can find." I answer, No. For it was as much comprised in God's decree that Hezekiah should eat, drink, and sleep, during those fifteen years; and that he should not jump into the sea with a millstone about his neck; as that fifteen years should be added to his life.—Cyrus was decreed to be the captor of Babylon, and an instrument of good to the Jewish people (g). Did that decree render it needless for Cyrus to be conceived and born? Surely, no: for the birth of Cyrus was no less infallibly secured by the decree itself than were the laurels he should reap and the good he was to do.

To multiply instances would be endless. Let us apply the few that have been given. If the Scriptures are true, God did, from all eternity, choose an innumerable multitude of Adam's posterity, to the certain attainment of grace and glory. This choice of them was in his Son: being pre-considered as fallen, they were chosen under that character, and federally given to him to be redeemed by his blood, and clothed with his righteousness. But this alone would not have sufficed. It was necessary that, as sinners, they should not only be redeemed from punishment and entitled to heaven; but endued, moreover, with an internal meetness for that inheritance to which they should be entitled and redeemed. This internal meetness for heaven can only be wrought by the restoring agency of God the Holy Ghost, who graciously engaged and took upon himself in the covenant of peace, to renew and "sanctify all the elect people of God;" saying I will put my law in their minds, and write it upon their hearts. This, most certainly was the view in which the decree of predestination was considered by the apostle Peter, when he thus wrote: Elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, [according to his foreknowledge of the human fall; which foreknowledge made it necessary that election should be decreed to take effect, not independently on God the Son and God the Holy Ghost, but] through sanctification of the spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ (h). It appears, from this golden passage, 1. That all the three Divine Persons are equally concerned in the salvation of sinners: the Father elected them; the Son shed his blood for them; the Spirit sanctifies them. 2. That the objects of election were considered in that eternal decree as fallen: else, I cannot see how they could be chosen unto the sprinkling of the Messiah's blood, and unto the sanctification of the Spirit. 3. That election, though productive of good works, is not founded upon them: on the contrary, they are one of the glorious ends to which the elect are chosen. Saints do not bear the root, but the root them. "Elect—unto obedience." 4. That they who have been elected by God the Father shall be sprinkled by the Son, or legally purified by his atonement in a way of pardon; and experience the Holy Spirit's sanctification, in beginning, advancing, and perfecting the good work of grace on their souls. Whence, 5. the elect, the sprinkled, and the sanctified, are made to obey the commandments of God, and to imitate Christ as a pattern at the same time that they trust in him as their propitiation. I said, made to obey. Here perhaps, the unblushing Mr. Wesley may ask, "Are the elect then, mere machines?" I answer, No. They are made (i) willing to obey, in the day of God's power. And I believe no body ever yet heard of a willing machine.

It appears from the passages of Scripture, now alleged, that God decreed to bring his elect to glory in a way of sanctification, and in no other way but that. "If so," cries Mr. Wesley, "they will be saved, whether they are sanctified or no." What, notwithstanding their sanctification is itself an essential branch of the decree concerning them? The man may as well affirm that Abraham might have been the progenitor of nations, though he died in infancy: that Paul might have preached the gospel, virid voce, in fifty different regions, without travelling a step: that Hezekiah might have lived his fifteen years without food or sleep: that Cyrus would have fulfilled the prophecies concerning him, if he had never been born: and that the Church of God might have been redeemed by the blood of Christ, even if Christ had never assumed human nature.

(f) Acts ix. 15    (g) Is. i. xlv. 28. and xlv. 1.

(h) 1 Pet. i. 2.

(i) Psalm cx. 3.

Prior to the taking of Jericho, it was revealed to Joshua that he should certainly be master of the place. Nay, so peremptory was the decree, and so express the revelation of it, that it was predicted as if it had already taken effect: I have given into thy hand Jericho, and the king thereof and the mighty men of valour (k). This assurance, than which nothing could be more absolute, did not tie up Joshua's hands from action, and make him sit down without using the means, which were no less appointed than the end. On the contrary, he took care to regulate the procession pursuant to God's command; and the event was accomplished accordingly.—From fact, let us ascend to speculation.—The doctrine, which stands this united test, is and must be true. Sup-

(k) Josh. vi. 3.

(l) Even Thomas Oliver, or Oliver's, the fighting shoe maker, is either a better reasoner, or an honest man than his leader: for, on a recent occasion (an occasion so well known to the religious world, since the appearance of the Icon, and Rev. Mr. Shirley's Narrative, just published, that it were needless for me to recite the particulars,) this same Thomas was so deeply convinced of the irreconcilable contrariety of the London Minutes to the Bristol Declaration; that, having solemnly avowed the former, either common conscience, or common sense, would not permit him to sign the latter.—Mr. Wesley, however, swallowed both. He could declare in the one, that "We are rewarded because of our works; for the sake of our works; yea, secundum merita operum, as our works deserve." In the other, the same identical Mr. Wesley declares that he doth, "abhor the doctrine of justification by works, as a most perilous and abominable doctrine;" and that "our works have no part in meriting or purchasing our salvation from first to last, either in whole or in part." Where lives the man who can bring these two poles together?

Dic quibus in terris, et eris mihi magnus Apollo.

All the sophistical wriggling, twisting, straining, and wire-drawing in the world will never be able to make the above North and South shake hands. Was any thing upon earth ever equal to Mr. Wesley's duplicity? Yes: I have met with something which comes at least extremely near it. I mean the conduct of Arminius himself (or, if you please of Van Harmen the first), when he was examined for the Leyden professorship, A. D. 1603. Take the account in the words of the learned and moderate Mr. Hickman. "He [Arminius] was the first tapster, or chamberlain in a common inn: from whence by the care of some guests, who were pleased, even to admiration, at his prompt wit, he was removed and sent to school. He was maintained there out of the public treasury of Amsterdam: where, in process of time, he was by the magistrates of the city made Pastor: the learned Junius being dead, Utenborgard thought none so meek to succeed him as Van Harmen: but the Belgic churches knew him too well to pose it was infallibly revealed to an army, or to any single individual, that the former should certainly gain such a battle, and the latter certainly win such a race. Would not the army be mad to say, "Then we will not fight a stroke?" Would not the racer be insane to add, "Nor will I move so much as one of my feet?" Now it is no less irrational to insinuate that the elect shall be saved without being spiritually and morally conformed to the image of Christ, than it would be to dream of gaining a battle without fighting, or of winning a prize without contending.—Would it not be absurd to affirm that Adam might have tilled and dressed the garden of Eden, whether he had been created or not? Equally illogical is Mr. Wesley's impudent slander, that "the elect shall be saved do what they will," i. e. whether they are holy or not.

This writer passes with some for a man of profound learning. But, surely, either his head is not so well furnished as these good people suppose; or his heart must be totally void of justice, candour, and truth. Either he is absolutely unacquainted with the first principles of reasoning; or he offers up the knowledge he has as a whole burnt-sacrifice on the altar of malice, calumny, and falsehood (l).

The consequence-drawer makes several let him easily come to such a place, in which he might influence all that were candidates for the ministry. The deputies of the churches did admonish Utenborgard that he would cease to commend so suspected a man to the curators of the University of Leyden. But he, too proud to regard such admonitions, desisted not to commend Arminius: who obtained his dismission from Amsterdam, to Leyden on the following condition; viz. "That he should first have a conference with the learned Gomarus; and in that conference, by a more free and open declaration of his opinion," i. e. of his real sentiments as to matters of religion, "free himself from all suspicion of heterodoxy; and that he should promise, if he had any singular opinions he would not discover them" [i. e. not disseminate them] "to the disturbances of the Churches.—Accordingly a conference there was, before the curators of the University and the deputies of the Synod; in which Arminius most expressly denied and condemned the opinions of the Pelagians concerning grace, free-will, original sin, perfection in this life, predestination: adding that he approved all that Augustin and other fathers had written against Pelagius; promising also to read nothing" [i. e. to deliver nothing to his pupils and other hearers] "dissonant to the received doctrine" [of Calvinism]. "Hereupon he was admitted Professor; and for some time, he defended the doctrine of the reformed churches in the point of Christ's satisfaction, justifying faith, justification by faith, perseverance in faith, certainty of salvation, and such other matters which afterwards he denied: and which he then" [viz. at the time of his defending them] "as is acknowledged by his good friend Corvinus, maintained against his conscience. He seemed by all his carriage to be one that was resolved not to venture any farther into the sea than that he might have opportunity to step when he pleased upon the shore." (Hickman's Animadversions on Reylin: p. 93, 94, Edit. 1674.)

Was I a believer of the Pythagorean Metempsychosis, I should certainly conclude that the soul of Arminius was transmigrated into that particular system of flesh and blood, known by the name of appeals to my translation of Zanchius; from some parts of which he labours to cull premises, whereof to make a basis for his consequences. Like some wretched divines, who first patch up a system of their own, and then rummage the Bible for such texts, as by the help of "a little convenient straining," may seem to prop the pre-constructed Babel. I shall attend, however, to such passages in my pamphlet as Mr. Wesley alludes to. Only I must premise that I shall give them, not as they are mis-quoted by the calumniator, but as they stand in the pamphlet itself.

I have said that love, when predicated of God, signifies his eternal benevolence: i. e. his everlasting will, purpose, and determination, to deliver, bless, and save his people. Whereon Mr. Wesley thus descants: "I appeal to all men, whether it is not a natural consequence even of this, that all these shall be saved do what they will." I also appeal to every person of common honesty, and common sense, whether the man who would wish to distil such an infamous consequence from so innocent a paragraph, be not defective either in sense or honesty? Does not God's determination to deliver his people include and ensure their deliverance (among other evils) from the reigning power and dominion of sin? Is it not his will to bless them by turning away every one of them from their iniquities? Acts iii. 26. Does not the Son of God condescend to bear the gracious name of Jesus, because he saves and shall save his people from their sins, both as to guilt, dominion and punishment? Mat. i. 21. Is it possible that a man who has read, and who believes, such texts as these, should still dare to persist in bawling without end, "The elect shall be saved do what they will?" That the elect shall infallibly be saved, is a truth as certain as the word and the (m) oath of God can make it. But then it is equally true that, in order to the eventual accomplishment of that salvation in the next world, grace is given them in this to preserve them (and preserve them it does) from doing the evil they otherwise would. Whom God did foreknow (or fore-love), he also did predestinate: to what? To be "saved, do what they will?" No, surely; but to be conformed to the spiritual and moral image of his Son, Rom. viii. 29. And this is all the election which Calvinism (or to speak more properly, Scripturism) contends for: even a predestination to holiness and heaven. It may here, perhaps, be objected that "the doctrine of predestination even to holiness itself may tend to relax the nerves of human diligence in the pursuit of that holiness to which men may suppose themselves predestinated." I utterly deny the doctrine to have any such tendency. And I deny it on Scripture warrant. The same apostle Peter, who declares that the people of God were elected unto obedience, exhorts those very people to give all diligence to make their calling and election undoubted; or to render it evidentially sure, by advancing in sanctification, and working the works of God: a direction this which the apostle (or, rather the Holy Spirit by him) would never have given had the doctrine of absolute election been subversive of industry and endeavours on the part of man.

Mr. Wesley himself, amidst all his pretension to the contrary, sees through the shameless fallacy of his own consequence. Witness the following passage: "All these," i. e. all God's people, "shall be saved, do what they will. You may say, Oh, but they will do only what is good. Be it so. Yet the consequence stands." In opposition to every part of this puerile paragraph, I should, 1. Be glad to know what Calvinist ever asserted that God's people "Will do

John Wesley. The reader, if he pleases may see some gleanings of Mr. John's astonishing inconsistencies in a little tract, drawn up by a respectable hand and just published, entitled, "An answer to some capital Errors contained in Minutes of some late Conversations between the Rev. Mr. Wesley and others." We have already had a specimen of James against Van Harmin and Van Harmin against James. Nor does the last mentioned tract exhibit a less striking contrast of Wesley against John, and John against Wesley.

One word more respecting the Bristol Declaration of August, 1771. Mr. Wesley's pre-avertion seems to have surprised even the unbelieving Thomas above mentioned. Witness the following passage of Mr. Shirley, Narrative, p. 16. "One of the [lay] preachers, namely, Mr. [Mr.] Thomas Oliver, kept us a long time in debate; strenuously opposed the declaration; [I hope he is not like the man at Aix la Chapelle, going to give his image the slip]" and to the last would not consent to sign it. He maintained that our second justification etc. in the day of judgment is by works; and he saw very clearly that for one that holds that tenet solemnly to declare in fustian that God that he has no trust or confidence but in the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, for justification, or salvation in life, death, or the day of Judgment, would be acting neither a consistent nor an upright part. For all the subtilities of metaphysical distinctions can never reconcile tenets so diametrically opposite as these."

Query 1. Has Tom the shoe-maker more learning, or more integrity, than John the priest? Which way soever the problem be determined, that the shoe-maker has the advantage in point of consistency, for not going beyond his last, is out of all doubt.

Query 2. People imagine that Mr. Wesley meant as he spoke, in the London Minutes of 1770. And most people continue to believe that he means now what he spoke then; and that he still has his mental reserves. What security, therefore, will he give the evangelical world that he is sincere in the counter-declaration of 1771?

Query 3. Why gadd'st thou about so much, to change thy way? Thou shalt be ashamed of Egypt, as thou wast of Assyria. Jer. ii. 36.

(m) Isai. lvi. 9. Heb. vi. 7, 18

only what is good?" A giddy perfectionist indeed might express himself in that manner: but none who have been led into the knowledge of God, of his law, or of themselves. Though we are asserters of real, we are nevertheless deniers of perfect, sanctification on earth. But 2. Supposing that we even believe that true saints will "do only what is good;" would it still follow that they shall be saved without sanctification? I should rather imagine that (so far from being unsanctified) the men who were to "do only what is good" must have been first completely sanctified; else the effect would rise higher than the cause. According therefore to Mr. Wesley's logic, perfect sanctification, evidenced by doing only that which is good, is but another phrase for no sanctification at all, and for trampling all God's commandments under foot! A reciprocation this, which by the way falls very heavy on such of his own followers as set up for sinless perfection: who, Mr. Wesley himself being judge, are necessarily a pack of arant Antinomians. This however is a consequence, from his premises, which the short-sighted Arminian did not discern. It now meets him full in the face. See it he must; and he may jostle by it as well as he can. Dost thou not think reader that the logician who thus reciprocates the most contrary and inconvertible ideas; who calls evil good, and good evil, putting light for darkness, and darkness for light; must be most exquisitely qualified to set up for a distiller of consequences?

Sensible of having hitherto produced nothing to his purpose, the Arminian is for pressing a fresh paragraph of mire into the service of his consequence. But before it would even seem to countenance the idea he meant it should convey, he found it expedient to give the passage a little needful pruning and more than a little alteration. To judge of this, let us contrast my paragraph with his quotation.

Predestination, as relating to the elect only, is that eternal, unconditional, particular, and irreversible act of the divine will, whereby, in matchless love and adorable sovereignty, God determined within himself to deliver a certain number of Adam's degenerate offspring, out of that sinful and miserable estate, into which, by his primitive transgression, they were to fall. Trans. of Zanch.

The substituting of "men" absolute for Adam's degenerate offspring; and the changing of sinful and miserable estate into "hell," may, at first view, seem unimportant alterations. But Mr. Wesley has long since declared himself averse to "altering for altering sake." And herein I believe him. He had an end to serve, in thus shaping my words to his purpose. For though men, and the degenerate offspring of Adam, are convertible terms; yet in the present argument the terms require some distinction. Election, as stated and defined in Zanchius, considers Adam's offspring not merely as men; but complexly, as degenerate. It was therefore dishonestly artful in the Pelagian to omit an epithet which is of such consequence as to give the specific tinge to the whole definition. Zanchy was a Sub-lapsarian; and so is his translator. Let the Pelagian, with whom I am contending learn, at least in his old age, to represent men and things as they are. If his fingers tingle to fall foul on the Supra-lapsarians, let him indulge his fingers as soon as he pleases. There are worthies in that sentiment, who are able to make Mr. Wesley look about him, and to bid the tingling shift from his fingers to his head.

Perversion and falsification are essential figures in this man's rhetoric. Just representation will not square with his views. Whence, in order to support his outrageous slander, that "the elect shall be saved, do what they will," he varies and castrates the definition he pretends to quote, and only affirms me to have declared that predestination is God's determining will "to deliver a certain number of men from hell." Predestination includes a great deal more. Let us have no shifting of the terms. My expression was, To deliver them from their sinful and miserable estate: i. e. to make them inchoatively holy, in order to their being inchoatively and finally happy. Now can any reasonable man suppose that deliverance from sin is but another name for continuance in sin? yet this must be not only supposed but proved ere it can be fairly alleged that, upon the principle of absolute predestination, "the elect shall be saved, do what they will."

Nor is that monstrous conclusion at all more inferrible from the following passage, cited also by this forger of consequences: not one of the elect can perish; but they must all necessarily be saved. (n) Here the Pelagian lashes himself into rage, and asks with no small emotion, "Can any assert this, and yet deny the consequences?" I answer Yes. Christ himself asserted it, without so much as entering a caveat against any such detestable inferences; and a caveat Christ would have entered, had the inference been deducible. This is the Father's will, who hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I shall lose nothing: John vi. 39. I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish: John x. 28.—Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory: John xvii. 24. Well therefore might the apostle throw a gauntlet of universal defiance, and ask, if God be for us, who can be against us? who can lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? who is he that condemns? who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Rom viii. 31—35. Now if it be the Father's will that Christ should lose none of his elect; if Christ himself, in consequence of their covenant-donation to him, does actually give them eternal life, and solemnly avers that they shall never perish; if God be so for them that none can hinder their salvation; if nothing can be laid to their charge; if they cannot be condemned and nought shall separate them from the love of Christ; it clearly and inevitably follows that none of the elect can perish, but they must all necessarily be saved. Which salvation consists as much in the recovery of moral rectitude below, as in the enjoyment of eternal blessedness above.

I have followed Mr. John through his first pair of consequences; which (together with their fabricator) I have shewn to be utterly void of judgment, strength, and truth. Let me now advert to the third pretended consequence:

III. "The reprobate shall be damned, do what they can."

One would almost imagine that none but a reprobate could be capable of advancing a position so execrably shocking. Surely it must have cost even Mr. Wesley much both of time and pains to invent the idea, and to find suitable language for its clothing! This however I make no scruple to declare, that, be his inventions easy or laborious, few men's invention ever sunk deeper into the despicable, launched wider into the horrid, or went farther in the profane. The satanic guilt of the person who could excogitate and publish to the world a position like that baffles all power of description, and is only to be exceeded (if exceedable) by the satanic shamelessness which dares to lay the black position at the door of other men.—Let us examine whether any thing occurring in Zanchius could justly furnish this wretched defamer with materials for a deduction so truly infernal.

I am aware indeed that a perverse mind, like a depraved constitution, is capable of corrupting (so far as itself is concerned) even cordials into poison. The very things which should have been for their health are to such persons an occasion of falling. Instances of this kind (if final) are the most awful comment on that tremendous decree of preterition whereof the Scriptures so largely and so strongly speak. God Almighty grant that Mr. Wesley may not himself be a seal to the truth of this remark!

In rummaging the treatise he pretends to quote, he no doubt fixed his claw on those passages which he imagined were most capable of mis-interpretation. Before I introduce them here I beg the reader's permission to premise a few general observations, which have a close connection with the subject.

The two capital objections (to which perhaps all others are reducible) against the degree of non-election are drawn, one from the justice, the other from the mercy, of God. Both these objections I shall endeavour to consider in their utmost force.

I. Justice consists in rendering to every man his due. The supposed injustice, therefore, of preterition turns on this question, "Whether God is, or is not, a debtor to man." I more than imagine that he is not a debtor to any man. He owes no man the least of all his favours: and indeed his blessings could not be called favours, if man could claim them in a way of debt.—Who hath prevented me, [i. e. been beforehand with me in any good thing] that I should repay him. (o) Even those whom he had made righteous are unable to earn or merit the smallest temporal or eternal benefit of his hands: If thou be righteous what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thy hand? Job xxxv. 11. Much less can the wicked (with whom alone reprobation has any thing to do) lay their Maker under obligation to save them. If it be proved that he owes salvation to every rational being he has made, then, and then only, it will follow that God is unjust in not paying this debt of salvation to each of his reasonable creatures. But, on the contrary, if God, instead of being an universal debtor (as Arminianism supposes him to be) is himself the universal creditor, who beneficently lends every earthly, and munificently bestows every celestial, happiness, according to the riches of his own free, sovereign, unmerited bounty—what shadow of injustice can be fastened on his conduct for in some cases withholding what he does not owe? The objection therefore (if it may be dignified by that name), being founded on a mistaken principle, evaporates into air.

Besides: the cavil will conclude as strongly against limited salvation (let its limitation be supposed to arise from what cause it will) as against the limiting decree. For I defy any man to shew in what single respect the actual limitation of happiness itself is a jot more just and equitable (in a being possessed with power) than the decreative limitation of the persons who shall enjoy that happiness. Until Mr. Wesley can demonstrate that every man is happy in this life; and that every man shall be so in the life to come; the argument, resulting from the plausible topic of divine justice, will never reach the merits of the case. If God is indebted to some men, why not to all? and if he owe salvation to all men, why will he condemn any man at last? should it be said that "some men will not permit God to pay them their debt of salvation, and by their own misbehaviour disqualify themselves from receiving it;" I answer, That to talk of man's not permitting God to be just is assuming a principle that cannot be allowed. God can never be over-ruled by man, until man is superior to God. Not to add that the Arminian hypothesis of men being God's creditors, rests (if it has any thing to rest upon) on the natural claim to happiness, where-with man is supposed to be invested in right of involuntary creatureship: he derives his existence from God, and therefore (says Arminianism) God is bound to make that existence happy. Admit but this and universal salvation comes in with a full tide. There can be none, no, not one, to whom the Judge will or can say at the final audit, Depart from me, I know you not, ye workers of iniquity. For even those who live and die in their sins, are certainly God's creatures: and if God owe salvation to all his creatures as such, even the workers of iniquity will and must be saved, or God must cease to be just. Who sees not that the Arminian scheme, if probed to the bottom, opens, by necessary consequence the flood-gates of practical licentiousness; and with all its pretences to good works, is in reality but varnished Antinomianism? It says in effect, "Every man shall be saved, do what he will: no man shall be condemned, do what he can. Let narrow-spirited Calvinists cease to do evil and learn to do well. Let gloomy predestinarians insist that without holiness no man shall see the Lord; and fondly dream that sanctity and salvation are indissolubly connected. But let us, the liberal disciples of Arminius, act on a more expanded plan. Every son of Adam is God's creature: and every creature of God is good. We are all indued with independent free-will. Our Maker loves every man alike. His justice will not suffer him to reject any of us. Especially seeing we are all redeemed, one as well as another. Let us therefore take our ease, eat, drink and be merry: and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant."

This is the true language of Arminianism though not of all Arminians. It is the natural consequence of the scheme itself, though many, who embrace the scheme, are not aware of the consequence.—You may say, "Oh but no man shall actually be saved, though salvation is his due, except he perform certain conditions." This is no better than a very thin evasion: a mere barrel thrown out for the amusement of the whale, to keep him in play and make him lose sight of the ship.—Permit me to ask, is salvation due to a man who does not perform those conditions? If you say, Yes; you jump hand over head into what you yourself call Antinomianism.—If you say that "salvation is not due to a man, unless he fulfil the conditions;" it will follow, 1. That man's own performances are meritorious of salvation, and bring God himself into debt: 2. That man, as a creature of God, is not entitled to salvation; and that God, as the Creator of man, is not therefore bound to save the men he has created.

There is no possible alternative. Either God is obliged in justice to save mankind; or he is not. If he be, it must be the works of men that lay him under the obligation. If he be not, then neither is he unjust in passing by some men: nay he might, had he so pleased, have passed by the whole of mankind, without electing any one individual of the fallen race; and yet have continued inviolably holy, just, and good.

Let us pursue the argument a little farther; and descend to instances rather more familiar: even to God's providential dealings with men in the present life. If eternal felicity be due to every man without exception, surely temporal felicity must be their due likewise: if they have a right to the greater, their claim to the less can hardly be doubted. If the Omnipotent is tied and bound, on penalty of becoming unjust, to do all he can to make every individual happy in the next life; he must be equally bound to render every individual happy in this. But are all men happy? Look round the world and say Yes if you can.—Is the Creator, therefore unjust? none but Satan would suggest it: none but his echoes will affirm it. The Lord is a God of truth, and without iniquity: just and right is he. Yet is it in the power of Omnipotence to banish misery from the universe. He could even have totally hindered its access. But, as the event demonstrates (and what speaks louder than fact?), it was not his will. He allows, and resolved to allow (for infinite wisdom does nothing ignorantly and undesignedly) its entrance, progress, and continuance. Sift the point ever so closely, and canvass the argument ever so nicely, you will find it extremely difficult (may I not say impossible?) to point out the difference between permission and design, in a being possessed (as God most certainly is) of unlimited wisdom and unlimited power. I am far from affirming that there is no difference between them: I only say that it would non-plus all the sagacity of man, should we attempt clearly to shew wherein the difference lies.

Is the constituted order of things mysterious? impenetrably so. Yet the mysteriousness of God's dispensations evinces, not the injustice of the Sovereign Dispenser, but the shallowness of human comprehension, and the shortness of human sight. Let us then, by embracing and revering the Scripture doctrines of predestination and providence, give God credit for being infinitely wise, just, and good; though for the present his way is in the deep, and his paths in the great waters, and his footsteps are not down.

I should imagine that very few, even of the Arminians themselves, will venture to deny the real inequality of providential distributions below: since to deny that would be to contravene the first principles of reason, and the indisputable voice of fact and observation. Will the Arminians therefore pronounce the Father of all unjust, because he does not make all his offspring equally rich, good and happy? It is impossible to stave back the horrid consequence, if he is bound (and he certainly has power) to prevent every evil both natural and moral, which yet he does not. Sin, pain, affliction, grief, disease, and death, in twice ten thousand forms, lay waste mankind. Nay there is a whole world of apostate angels, who are banished from God and suffer without respite and without hope.<sup>(p)</sup> Yet the Deity could have put a negative upon all this. The same effectual grace which preserved the elect angels from falling could have preserved the rest, and have presented the whole choir faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. It could likewise have precluded the transgression of Adam, and all its (seemingly dismal) consequences. Or man being fallen, the same converting energy which retrieves some sinners to God is able to retrieve all. What shall we say then to these things? They can only be accounted for on the grand principle of God's absolute sovereignty, who doth according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth, i. e. who is the uncontrollable disposer of angels and of men; and none can stay his hand or say unto him, what dost thou? Dan. iv. 35.

(p) "It may be observed," says a great divine, "that we can hear and read of the non-election and reprobation of angels, with very little notion of what the devil may be cast down to hell, to be everlastingly damned, and appointed thereto; and it moves no great concern. No hard thoughts against God arise, no charge of cruelty, injustice, and want of kindness to his creatures and offspring. But, when any thing of this kind is hinted at with respect to any of the apostate sons of Adam, presently there is an outcry against it, and objections upon objections, are suggested. The reason is, because the latter [viz. the non-election of some men] comes nearer home.

Our Lord also teaches us this important lesson: Even so Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight: Matth. xi. 26.

The king of Great Britain has an unlimited right of peerage. He might, if such was his pleasure, ennoble every family in his dominions. Will any be so weak and perverse as to charge him with tyranny and injustice, only because it is not his will, though it is in his power, to make all his subjects noblemen?

But I shall be told perhaps that, "allowing God to act as a sovereign in his disposal of earthly benefits, this will not prove his acting on the same principle in his distribution of heavenly blessings: since between things temporal and things eternal the proportion will not hold." I answer, (1.) Things eternal are as much at his disposal as things temporal. God is either sovereign of all things or of nothing. His empire is undivided: and from his dominion nothing is excepted. Nor, indeed, if things spiritual and everlasting were not his, could he be said to give them to his people: which he is every where in Scripture affirmed to do. (2.) I grant that time and eternity are, in themselves, by no means parallel or commensurate. Yet if God were unjust in not ordaining one man as well as another to eternal happiness; the old Consequence (already mentioned) would follow too, viz. That he must be proportionably unjust in not ordaining all men to absolute happiness here on earth. For misery, though endured but for a year, or for a life-time, is, in its own nature, and for the time being, as truly misery as it would be if protracted ever so long. The pro quale is the same, however the pro diu may vary. And God can no more cease to be just for a year, or for a man's life-time, than he can cease to be just for a century or for ever. By the same rule that he can and does, without any impeachment of his moral attributes, permit any one being to be miserable for a moment; he may permit that being to be miserable for a much longer time: and so on ad infinitum: since, as was observed but now, he can no more be unjust for a single moment than he can be unjust for ever.

Will Mr. Wesley deny that there is such a thing as temporal evil, so called? he must

It is owing to partiality to ourselves, our nature, and our race. Whereas far greater severity, if it may be so called, is exercised on fallen angels, than on fallen men. God has not spared one of the angels that sinned; has provided no Saviour for them; not so much as given them the means of grace: while not only a Saviour is provided for fallen men, and means of grace allowed them; but thousands, and ten thousands, millions and millions of them are saved, by the abundant mercy and grace of God through Christ."

Dr. Gill's Body of Divinity; vol. 1. p. 315.

first renounce his senses—or, admitting the existence of it, will he exempt it from the providence of God? will he say that it happens (as Cicero affirms Milo's servants to have slain Clodius, "neque imperante, neque sciente, neque presente, Domino,") God neither ordaining it nor knowing it, nor being so much as present? This would be atheism. For if any thing can come to pass in contrariety either to God's knowledge or his will, it must arise from a defect of wisdom, of power, or of goodness: and to suppose God deficient in these would be tantamount to supposing that there is no God at all.

I conclude then that the quantity of what is called secular evil is considerably great; and that every man comes in for his allotted share of it, more or less, and in one kind or other: (g) That this however does not arise from defect of wisdom in God; for he could have so drawn the plan, and have so conducted its execution, as to have effectually precluded all evil whatever. Nor from defect of vigilance; for not an hair can fall from our heads without his appointment, leave, and notice. Nor defect of power; for all second causes are totally and constantly dependent on him, both for existence, activity, and effectosity. Nor from defect of justice; for he is "holy in all his ways, and righteous in all his works." Yet, though all-wise, all-vigilant, all-powerful, and all-just, he permits and has for near six thousand years permitted the reign of natural evil. Upon the same principle, might he not extend its reign to a still greater, yea, to an inconceivable length? might he not even draw it out to a never ending duration? He might: or this blasphemous and contradictory consequence (a consequence which I wonder Mr. Wesley never added to his others) must and will be indelible, that infinite justice has acted unjustly ever since the fall of Satan and his angels, and of Adam and his sons.

Should it be urged that "moral evil, or the transgression of angels and of man, was the producing cause of all the natural evil to which they have been liable ever since;" this will be urging no more than what every Calvinist admits. But still the old difficulty (a difficulty which Arminianism will never solve while heaven and earth remain)—the old difficulty still survives: how came moral evil to be permitted, when it might easily have been hindered, by a being of infinite goodness, power, and wisdom? Natural evil is but the fruit of moral: and had God not permitted the latter, the former could not have existed. "Oh, but he endowed Adam with free-will." True. But did not He whose understanding is infinite, (r) pre-discern all the consequences of that endowment, and fore-know whither Adam's free-will would lead him, and what use he would make of it? And could not God have endowed him with such holy strength of will as would have infallibly secured his perseverance in rectitude and happiness? "Oh, but then Adam would not have been a free-agent." Indeed but he would. God himself is a free-agent, though his will is necessarily unchangeable, and singly determined to do good, and to do good only. So are the elect angels. So are the glorified souls of saints departed, and so will both angels and saints be when time is over. And so might Adam have been had God pleased to have so created him. He might have been invariably holy, and his agency have continued free.

God is, and cannot but be, inviolably just, amidst all the sufferings of fallen angels and fallen men, involuntary beings as they are. And if his justice is unviolated amidst all they have suffered, and many of the latter do suffer (though God could have prevented the whole, both root and branch); consequently he will yet continue to be just in all they are yet to suffer. And if so, what becomes of the objection to God's decree of preterition, drawn from the article of injustice?

2. "And what becomes of mercy?" This I shall next enquire.

Mercy is considerable under a two-fold view: as it is an attribute in God; and as it is exercised toward men.—As an attribute in God, mercy is infinite; as all his attributes are and must be: because they necessarily coincide with his essence. But mercy, considered in the exercise of it, is neither necessarily nor actually infinite. As God's forbearing to create more worlds than he has is no impeachment of his omnipotence; so his forbearing to save as many as he might is no impeachment of his infinite mercy. I have touched this subject elsewhere. Let me for once quote myself. "Goodness, considered as it is in God, would have been just the same infinite and glorious attribute, supposing no rational beings had been created at all, or saved when created. To which may be added, that the goodness of the Deity does not cease to be infinite in itself, only because it is more extended to some objects than it is to others. The infinity of this perfection, as residing in God and coinciding with his essence, is sufficiently secured, without supposing it to reach indiscriminately to all the creatures he has made. For was that way of reasoning to be admitted it would lead us too far, and prove too much: since, if the infinity

(g) Hence, viz. from its universal diffusion be low, it seems to have acquired the name of natural evil. (v. Psalm xlviii. 3.

of his goodness is to be estimated by the number of objects upon which it terminates there must be an absolute proper infinity of reasonable beings to terminate that goodness upon. Consequently it would follow, from such premises, either that the creation is as truly infinite as the Creator; or, if otherwise, that the Creator's goodness could not be infinite, because it has not an infinity of objects to make happy." (s) If therefore the decree of reprobation be exploded on account of its imaginary incompatibility with divine mercy; we must upon the same principle charge God with want of goodness in almost every part of his relative conduct. Arminians would do well to consider to what tremendous lengths their doctrine carries them. There is no way of solidly asserting "eternal providence," and of justifying "the ways of God with men," but upon this grand datum, that the exercise of his own infinite mercy is regulated by the voluntary determinations of his own most wise and sovereign pleasure. Allow but this rational, scriptural, (and I should think, incontrovertible, proposition; and every cavil grounded on the chimerical unmercifulness of non-election ceases even to be plausible.

But what if, after all, that very cruelty which Mr. Wesley pretends to charge on Calvinism, be found really chargeable on Arminianism? I pledge myself to prove this in its proper place, before I conclude this tract.

In the mean while I am all attention to those passages which he cites from me in affected support of his own horrible theses, that "the reprobate shall be damned, do what they can." The passages are eight.

1. When hatred is [in Scripture] ascribed to God, it implies, (1.) a negation of benevolence; or a resolution not to have mercy on such and such men. (2.) It denotes displeasure and dislike. (3.) It signifies a positive will to destroy the reprobate for their sins. (t) This, says the Pelagian, is "damning men, do what they can:" as if in punishing the wicked for the sins they have committed, God condemned them for endeavouring to become good! An inference so flatly contrary both to the premises and to common sense could only flow from such a pen as that of Mr. Wesley. This, even this is the man who has compiled a three-penny tract to explain the rules of logic! As to what is said of Esau, until the Pelagian can prove (which I defy him to do) that Esau did all he could to be saved, the consequence will not hold even as to him.

2. Reprobation denotes either, (1.) God's eternal preterition of some men, when he chose others to glory; and his predestina-tion of them [viz. in a way of permission] to fill up the measure of their iniquities, and then to receive the just punishment of their crimes: or (2.) It may likewise signify God's forbearing to call by his grace those whom he hath thus ordained to condemnation (u). According to this simple and scriptural state of the case, reprobation is for the most part, a thing purely negative: and consists in God's not chusing some to glory, and not calling them by grace. Even his resolving to let such fill up the measure of their iniquities (which, by and by, we shall find to be a Scripture-phrase), has, so far as God is concerned, more in it of negation than of positivity: and is only tantamount to this, that the ungodly take advantage of the non-interference of grace, to follow the corrupt dictates of their own hearts, so far as they are not restrained by providence.

And now what hurt is there in this view of the argument? Is it not a fact verified by every day's observation? We see and hear of evil committed continually. But if effectual grace did interfere, that evil would not be committed. Yet is God in no sense the author of sin. If I am acquainted with an indigent neighbour, and have it in my power to enrich him and do it not, am I the author of that man's poverty, only for resolving to permit him, and for actually permitting him, to continue poor? Am I blameable for his poverty, because I do not give him the utmost I am able? Similar is the case now in debate. Ever since the fall of Adam, mankind are by nature spiritually poor. Was God obliged either to keep them from becoming so; or is he obliged to re-enrich them afterwards, with the blessings of grace and glory? I have proved already that God is not a debtor to his creatures. Who then and what art thou, O man that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay to make, of the same lump, one vessel unto honour and another unto dishonour? What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction; even that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy whom he had afore prepared unto glory (x)?

Now are these the words of Scripture, or are they not? If not, prove the forgery. If they be, you cannot fight against reprobation without fighting against God.—"Oh, but God has no right to make any vessels unto dishonour: no right to shew his wrath and make his power known. It is tyranny,

(s) Doctr. of Abs. Predest.

(t) Doctr. of Abs. Predest.

(u) Doctr. of Abs. Predest.

(x) Rom. ix. 20—23.

cruelty, injustice, partiality. He is bound to make every man a saint. He ought to make every man happy." Stop, friend. Your argument, if it holds at all, leads farther than you seem aware of. If God, in order to prove himself impartial, ought to make all men vessels unto honour, he ought to do more. He ought to have made us all arch-angels, and greater still, if greater can be. He ought to go even ad ultimum sui posse, and to make us all as honourable, glorious and happy, as omnipotence itself can. Where will you be able to draw the line of limitation? Either therefore you must plunge into profaneness and absurdity, without measure and without end; or you must submit to the good old doctrine of Christ and his apostles: the former of whom expressly asserts that it is lawful for God to do what he will with his own; and the latter with one voice declare that he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.

3. Another very innocent definition (though wretchedly mutilated, according to custom, in Mr. Wesley's citation) stands thus: Predestination, as it regards the reprobate, is that eternal, most holy, sovereign, and immutable act of God's will, whereby he hath determined to leave some men to perish in their sins and to be justly punished for them (y).—Against this John offers a query: "Can they avoid it?" [i. e. can the reprobate avoid punishment] "by any thing they do?" Let me also put a query to the querist: can you prove that any one of them ever did what he could to avoid it? If this cannot be proved, it does not follow that "the reprobate shall be damned, do what they can."

Let us, moreover, (with all the respect and caution due to a subject to awful) enquire whether it be not, according to the Scripture account, plain, positive matter of fact, that God hath left some men in their sins, to be justly punished for them. What is the reason assigned by the Spirit of God why the profligate sons of Eli were deaf to their father's exhortations? They hearkened not to the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them (1 Sam. ii. 25). In other words, 'God had determined to leave them to perish in their sins and to be justly punished for them.' Many other instances might be produced from the Old Testament. I shall however carry my appeal to the New. And my following proofs of that proposition shall be taken not from the epistles, but from the gospels (z).

Thou Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained unto this day. Matth. xi. 23. It follows hence that, though God knew the citizens of Sodom would have reformed their conduct, had his providence made use of effectual means to that end, still these effectual means were not vouchsafed. What is this but saying that God had determined to leave those criminals to perish in their sins, and to be justly punished for them?—"But if the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah were left to perish; how came the Capernautes, who enjoyed "such superior means of grace, to continue impenitent?" Our Lord himself answers this question, v. 25—27. Thou hast hid these things [the great things of conversion and salvation] from the wise and prudent; even so Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight:—No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son [βουληται] may will to reveal him.

What shall we say of the words that follow? Ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them who killed the prophets: wherefore fill ye up the measure of your fathers. Matth. xxiii. 31, 32. Surely these were 'left to perish in their sins, and to be punished for them!'

Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God. But unto them that are without [i. e. who were not within the pale of election], all these things are done in parables; that seeing they may see, and not perceive, and hearing they may hear, and not understand: lest at any time they should be converted and their sins be forgiven them. Mark iv. 11, 12. St. Matthew, if possible, expresses it still more strongly: It is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to them it is not given. Matth. xi. 13.

Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word. John viii. 43.

Jesus said, for judgment I am come into this world; that they who see not might see; and that they who see might be made blind. John ix. 39.

Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. John x. 26.

Once more. Though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him: That the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? Therefore they could not believe because that Esaias said again, he hath (y) Doctr. of Abs. Predest.

(z) The Apostolic epistles are of equal authority with the gospels, and were written under the unerring influence of the same Holy Spirit. It being however not unusual, with some of the modern Arminians, to call upon us for proof of our doctrines from the gospels in particular, I have selected two or three testimonies thence: which testimonies for the reason now alleged, are therefore classed by themselves.

blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart ; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted that I should heal them. John xii. 37—40.

Now I leave to the decision of any unprejudiced capable man upon earth, whether it be not evident, from these passages (among a multitude of others), that ‘God hath determined to leave some men to perish in their sins, and to be justly punished for them?’ In affirming which I only gave the Scripture as I found it. Nay I never expressed my sentiments concerning reprobation half so strongly as the word of God does. It follows that I had,

4. Very ample ground for asserting that there is a predestination of some particular persons to death (2 Cor. iv. 3. 1 Pet. ii. 8. 2 Pet. ii. 12. Jude iv. Rev. xvii. 8.); which death they shall inevitably undergo justly, and on account of their sins (d). “That is,” says my Pelagian expositor, “they shall be damned, do what they can.” I totally deny the explication: unless by their doing what they can, he means their committing all the evil they can. For, as it follows in the very page whence part of the above extract was taken, sin is the meritorious and immediate cause of any man’s damnation: God condemns and punishes the non-elect, not merely as men, but as sinners. To which I even ventured to add that, had it pleased the great Governor of the universe to have entirely prevented sin from having any entrance into the world, it should seem as if God could not, consistently with his own attributes, have condemned any man at all. So infinitely remote am I from either thinking or asserting directly or implicitly, that “the reprobate shall be damned, do what they can!” The Pelagian should rather have declared this to be his resolution, ‘I am determined to contradict and blaspheme, say what you will.’

5. He represents me as affirming in so many words that “the non-elect were predestinated to eternal death:” for which words he refers by an asterism to my second chapter. I call upon him to tell me in what part of that chapter I make use of those words. Be they ever so expressive of my real belief, the words themselves are his. They occur not even in the fourth chapter, which treats professedly of reprobation. Will no length of years, nor infamy of detection, restrain this man from forgery?

If Mr. Wesley, instead of acknowledging his guilt and promising reformation for the future, should be hardened and mean enough to say, “Oh but though you have not made use of the words, either in those chapters or in the whole book, yet the sense of those words is inferrible from many passages incurring from both.” I answer, be it so; yet this consequence stands, that the assailant who coins words for his adversaries which they never spoke, is not an honest man. When propositions are attacked, it is not enough to give the supposed sense of those propositions. The very phraseology in which they are expressed should be cited without variation, just as they came from the pen of the defendant. Words are the dress of thought. And an alteration of dress may so far disguise the wearer as to make him appear quite a different person.

But supposing I had even syllabically expressed my opinion in those very terms; still the consequence alleged would have lagged far behind the premises. For the old question would again have recurred, viz. Can Mr. Wesley produce a single instance of any one man who did all he could to be saved, and yet was lost? If he can, let him tell us who that man was, where he lived, when he died, what he did, and how it came to pass he laboured in vain. If he cannot, let him either retract his consequences, or continue to be posted for a shameless traducer.

6. The condemnation of the reprobate is necessary and inevitable. This I have both said and persist to say. It is a position which unavoidably follows even from the foreknowledge of God, putting all decrees quite out of the question. Only allow that some sinners actually will be condemned in the last day; and that God always knew and knows at this moment who those persons will be; and (not Mr. Wesley’s, but) my consequence stands unshaken, that the condemnation of the reprobate is necessary and inevitable. Should it be said that “the fore-knowledge of God has no effective influence on events;” I answer that whether it has or not (which, however, would admit of some debate), still every event must and certainly will correspond to his foreknowledge of it: else the divine foreknowledge would be mere guess, and evaporate into empty, fallible, uncertain conjecture: i. e. the knowledge of God would be inferior to the knowledge which even man, in many cases, is possessed of. It was the consideration of this which induced the great Dr. South to renounce the Arminian novelties, and fall in with doctrinal Calvinism. I wish it may (for his own sake) have as good effect on little Mr. Wesley. I say for his own sake: since himself would be the principal gainer by his submission to grace. We should acquire very little honour by the acquisition of such a proselyte.

"Surely," cries Mr. Wesley, "I need add no more on this head." You need not: unless, with all your diving, you could fetch up something to the purpose. "You see," continues the repetitionist, "that the reprobate shall be damned, do what they can, is the whole burden of the song." I have proved, and the reader has seen, that it makes no part of the song. But this I see, that unless God give Mr. Wesley repentance to the acknowledging of the truth, the unparalleled perverseness with which he labours to blacken some doctrines of Christianity will be the burden of his soul in the hour of death and in the day of judgment.

7. That the number of the elect, and also of the reprobate, is so fixed and determinate that neither can be augmented nor diminished, is affirmed in Zanchius, (b) and rests on clear, positive, repeated testimonies of Holy Scripture.—I would not scruple to hinge the whole weight of this proposition, likewise, on the certain and immutable knowledge of God. I know, says Christ, whom I have chosen (John xiii. 18.); but was the number fluctuating and precarious, susceptible of addition and diminution, Christ could not be said to know them, but only to guess at them. Absolute certainty is the alone ground of positive knowledge. Whatever is unfix'd and unsure can, at the very highest, be the basis of no more than probable supposition.

So again, I know my sheep, John x. 14. But if their number was indeterminate, they could not be known: the sheep of to-day might degenerate into goats to-morrow; and the goats of yesterday might become sheep to-day, and be goats again before night. Nay, it might so happen that all his sheep might cease to remain such; and the great Shepherd might, at the long run, not have a single sheep to know. On the contrary, if Christ actually knows his sheep, and whom [εἰς, the very individual persons] he hath chosen; it follows that he must also know who are not his sheep, and whom he hath not chosen. I assert therefore again that if Omniscience itself knows any thing of the matter, the number of both is so fixed and determinate that neither can be augmented or diminished. The apostle himself makes use, among others, of this very argument: the foundation [or purpose] of the Lord standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. 2 Tim. ii. 19.

Let me recommend one or two passages more to the reader's consideration. The election hath obtained, and the rest were blinded [επιρωθησαν, were hardened]; according as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear, unto this day. Rom. xi. 7, 8. Being disobedient, whereunto they were also appointed. 1 Pet. ii. 8. Whose names were not written in the Book of Life from the foundation of the world. Rev. xvii. 8. There is no meaning in words, if it does not follow, even from these few stubborn texts, as evidently as light flows from the sun, that the number of the elect and reprobate can neither be augmented nor diminished. The very nature, whether of election or of reprobation, makes this point manifest as to both: since, could the number of the elect (for instance) be lessened, the deduction would augment the number of the reprobate; for what was taken from the one would necessarily add to the other. In which case it would not be true that the election obtained and the rest were blinded. Nor would Solomon's assertion be true: I know that whatsoever God doth it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it. Eccles. iii. 14. Now this must be meant, either of God's immanent acts, in a way of decree; or of his transient acts, in a way of providence. But it cannot be meant of his providential acts: for they are always the same: they are not for ever. It must therefore be meant of his immanent acts, i. e. of his decrees, purposes, and determinations, which cannot vary, but are for ever; to which nothing can be put or added, and from which nothing can be taken away. The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, and the thoughts of his heart to all generations. Psal. xxxiii. 11. He is of one mind, who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doth: for he performeth the thing that is appointed for me, and many such things are with him. Job xxiii. 14.

8. The decrees of election and reprobation are immutable and irreversible (c). Mr. Wesley cites the sentence, but takes care to omit touching upon (or even producing) any one of the seven arguments brought by Zanchy in support of it. Let the Arminian refute these, or he will never succeed in his attack upon that. But he found it easier to spin a

IVth Consequence; namely, That, on the hypothesis of an absolute decree, there can be no such thing as sin: "It cannot," says this wonderful discoverer, "be sin in a spark to rise, or in a stone to fall."

If Mr. Wesley's illustration has any meaning at all, the meaning must be this: "Sparks and stones are incapable of moral agency; therefore men are so too. Sparks and stones are neither rewardable or punishable: Ergo, men are not responsible for the sins they commit." The Arminian might as well have said, "Sparks and stones have no legs: Ergò, men have none. Sparks and stones are not endued with any of the five senses: Ergò, men can neither hear, see, feel, taste, nor smell." One would think that the levity of a spark and the dulness of a stone were, by a strange kind of association, united in Mr. John Wesley, before he could dream of illustrating his point by such an extraordinary brace of similes, which are no more related to the subject than a turf to an archangel,—“Oh, but you do not touch the main string. A spark rises, and a stone falls, necessarily. It is the necessity by which they rise and fall, that renders stones and sparks incapable of sinning.” As if mere matter (supposing it could be even exempted from the laws of necessity) would therefore be capable of virtue and vice!

(a) Doctr. of Abs. Predest.

(c) Doctr. of Abs. Predest.

Mr. Wesley is singularly unhappy in the choice of his comparisons; and as singularly awkward in his application of them. The point he wishes to prove is evidently this: that “absolute decrees, prescience, and providence, are inconsistent with human free-agency; and, of course, that the finally wicked are not justly punishable for the evil they commit.” I have purposely stated this objection in the clearest and strongest terms: lest I should even seem desirous of eluding instead of answering.—Now, if I can evince from the express doctrine of Scripture, and from express facts recorded in Scripture, that eventual necessity, or infallible certainty of event, is not incompatible with so much free-agency in man as may suffice to render him punishable for breaking the law of God, the objection will at once vanish into its native nothing.

1. For the doctrine of Scripture.—Woe to the world because of offences: for it must needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh (Matt. xviii. 7.) Αναγκη εστι, there is a necessity that offences should come. Then surely, may an Arminian say, “There can be no woe due to the introducers of that whose introduction is necessary!” Our Lord says, Yes, there is. I conclude then, that necessity of event does not render sin excusable, nor the sinner impunable.—Again, when ye shall hear of wars, &c., be ye not troubled; for such things must needs be: δει γενεσθαι, they must come to pass. Mark xiii. 7. And yet, though there is a must-be for these events, that necessity does not supersede either the moral or the natural volitions of the parties concerned. — So 1 Cor. xi. 19.

There must be heresies among you. But if this necessity for heresies did not absolutely coincide with the wills of the heretics, how could any heretics be blameable? — Once more. He [i. e. Christ] must reign until he hath put all his enemies under his feet. 1 Cor. xv. 25. There is therefore a necessity for Christ's reigning: yet, I fancy, even Arminians themselves will hardly venture to affirm that Christ reigns against his own will. Absolute necessity then is perfectly consistent with willingness and freedom in good agency, no less than in bad. For it is a true maxim, Ubi voluntas ibi libertas: all action is sufficiently free wherein a person's will is engaged: be his will engaged ever so necessarily.

2. Next for Scripture facts.

Joseph's brethren acted freely, i. e. with the full bent of their wills, when they sold him to the Midianites who carried him into Egypt. But, in truth, though they sold him to gratify their own malice, and had no higher view in what they did, they undesignedly fulfilled the decree of God. Whence Joseph's pious and just remark afterwards: Be not grieved nor angry with yourselves that ye sold me hither; for God did send me before you, to preserve life. So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God. Gen. xlv. 5, 8. As for you, ye thought evil against me: but God meant it for good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive. Chap. 1. 20. So the Psalmist: He [i. e. God] sent a man before them, even Joseph, who was sold for a servant. Psalm cv. 17. It was God that sent him, though his brethren sold him.

Pharaoh acted freely (i. e. willingly), in his refusal to dismiss the Israelites: or, in other words, he refused to send them away, because his will was against their going. And yet he could will no otherwise than he did; Exod. vii. 3, 4. So, when Saul went home to Gibeah, it is said there went with him a band of men whose hearts God had touched: i. e. whose wills God had effectually inclined. 1 Sam. x. 26. Yet it cannot be inferred hence, that they did not go freely. In like manner, God is said to have stirred up the Spirit of Cyrus, or powerfully to have influenced his will, to issue an edict for the re-building of the temple. Yet this, though a necessary, was a free, act of that monarch. Ezra i. 1. The effects of that edict are also to be noted: Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests and the Levites, with all them whose spirit the Spirit of God (d) had raised to go

(d) The eminently pious and learned bishop Beveridge gives a spiritual improvement of this passage, too valuable and just to be omitted here. These are his words: “It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do, of his own good pleasure. So that, though God offer heaven to all that will accept of it, in his Holy Scripture; yet none can accept of it but such whom himself stirs up by his Holy Spirit to endeavour after it. And thus we find it was in Israel's return from Babylon to Jerusalem. Though king Cyrus made a proclamation that whosoever would might go up to worship at the holy city: yet up, v. 5. Will any man say that these did not will freely, only because they willed necessarily? It was from the acrimony of his own heart that Shimei cursed David: consequently his will was in it. And yet the Lord had said unto him, Curse David: i. e. he did it by God's own efficacious permission. 2 Sam. xvi. 10. Absalom, and the men of Israel who were with him, acted with perfect freedom, and with the full exercise of their reason, when they agreed in preferring the counsel of Hushai to that of Ahithophel: and yet, in so doing, their wills acted in absolute subserviency to the will and decree of God, who had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that the Lord might bring evil upon Absalom. 2 Sam. xvii. 14. Thus also God foretold that he would turn the Assyrian king loose upon Israel, who should take them for his prey, and tread them down as mire in the street: in all which, when it came to pass, the king of Assyria acted merely on principles of ambition, cruelty, and pride; and, consequently, acted freely; proposing no other end to himself than the gratification of his own savage will and tyrannic disposition. Whereas, in reality, he was appointed of God to avenge his righteous quarrel with a hypocritical people, and to be the instrument, not merely of human, but, chiefly, of divine, resentment. Howbeit, says God, he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so: but it is in his heart to destroy and to cut off nations not a few. Isa. x. 6, 7.—Thus it is said concerning the ten kings who shall hate the mystic harlot, and destroy her, and burn her with fire, that God hath put into their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and to give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled. Rev. xvii. 17. Does it follow that these kings must be stript of all free-agency, and cease to be accountable for their actions, and commence mere machines, only because God will bring their wills into subjection to his own?

Thanks be to God, says the apostle, who put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you: for indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you. 2 Cor. viii. 16, 17. Here it is said that God himself put that earnest care into the heart of Titus which induced him to visit the Corinthians. And yet Titus visited them of his own accord, or without any sensible compulsion. God therefore may work efficaciously on the human will, and the will (though it necessarily follows that efficacious direction) remain quite unforced. This is farther evident from the account which St. Paul gives of his own case, as a preacher: though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of; for necessity is laid upon me [αναγκη μοι επικειται], yea, woe is me if I preach not the gospel. 1 Cor. ix. 16. Yet he preached the gospel freely and willingly. Necessity therefore, and freedom, are very good friends, notwithstanding all the efforts of Arminianism to set them at variance.—I have already observed that the great and awful transaction of Christ's crucifixion was, from all eternity, positively decreed and infallibly foreknown of God: yet neither did that decree, nor that foreknowledge, abate the guilt of those who accomplished both: for they were, at once, necessary and voluntary agents. Let me, as the subject so directly falls in with the point in hand, bestow a few moments upon it here.

The death of Jesus Christ was both the most important event that ever came to pass, and the most sinful act (in his murderers) that ever was committed. So wonderful are the ways of God!—this great event was predestinated in all its circumstances. It was not a matter of chance, but a matter of decree.—Thinkest thou that I cannot pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? but how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? Matt. xxvi. 53, 54.—And he began to teach them that the Son of man must suffer many things. Mark viii. 31.—I say unto you, that this that is written must yet be accomplished in me, And he was numbered with the transgressors. Luke xxii. 37.—The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified. Luke xxiv. 7.—Concerning Judas in particular, thus speak the oracles of God: Men and brethren, this Scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus. Acts i. 16. And concerning all the other accomplices in this tremendous deed, it is expressly declared that they were gathered together, to do whatsoever God's hand and God's counsel ωροωρισε γενεσθαι, had predestinated to be done. Acts iv. 27, 28. Yet, throughout the whole, there was none that accepted of the offer but those whose spirit God had raised to go up. So here, saith God doth, as it were, proclaim to all the world, that whosoever will come to Christ shall certainly be saved; yet it doth not follow that all shall receive salvation from him: because it is certain all will not come—or, rather, none can will to come, unless God enables them. I am sure, to say none shall be saved but those that will of themselves, would be sad news for me, whose will is naturally so backward to every thing that is good. But this is my comfort; I am as certain my salvation is of God, as I am certain it cannot be of myself. It is Christ who vouchsafed to die for me, who hath likewise promised to live within me. It is he that will work all my works, both for me and in me too."—Private Thoughts, Art. VIII.

they acted freely. The Jews delivered him to Pilate δια φθονον, from a principle of envy and hatred. As the prophet says in another case, They knew not the thoughts of the Lord, neither understood they his counsel. No thanks to them that the decree of God was fulfilled, and the salvation of the Church effected by their putting Christ to death. They were as free and unforced in willing his crucifixion, and in bringing it about, as if there had been no decree in the case. The Saviour was indeed delivered up to their rage, τη ωρισμενη βεβλη και προγνωσειτε θεος, by the determinate decree and foreknowledge of God; and his death was therefore, in the utmost sense of the word, necessary, being inevitably pre-ordained: and yet they took and slew him δια χειρων ανομων, with lawless, wicked hands. Acts ii. 23. The wickedness they were guilty of in perpetrating this crime was not excusable, nor the lawlessness of it mitigated, by the necessity of its coming to pass: since they only sought to satiate the rancour of their own wills, and to glut their own sanguinary malice.

From all which, and from many other

(e) I am far from standing alone in this assertion. Men, the dust from whose volumes I am not worthy to wipe, have intimated as much before me. "The old astronomers," says the celebrated Dr. John Edwards, of Cambridge, "used to tell us that the inferior orbs of heaven have all their proper" [i. e. their own peculiar] "motions, and yet, at the same time, are carried by the movement of the highest sphere; the primum mobile, as they called it. Which notion, if we apply it to the present case" [i. e. to the consistency of divine decrees with human freedom], "is no hypothesis or fiction, but a reality of the greatest importance: for all things and persons, besides a tendency which they may seem to have of their own, have another impressed upon them by the decree, the first mover of all: and this overrules and controls all: and yet in such a way as is suitable to the particular nature of all agents whatsoever."—Veritas Redux, p. 28.

It may be objected to Dr. Edwards' testimony, that he was a professed Calvinist: and therefore only wrote in harmony with his own favourite principle.—But what if the same principle be a favourite one with such eminent and masterly Anti-Calvinists as the present most learned bishop of Bristol; the late worthy dean Prideaux; and that exquisite proficient in refined literature, Monsieur Rollin?

I begin with the first of this respectable triumvirate: to whom, for his matchless Dissertation on the Prophecies, both the religious and the learned world are under the deepest obligations. In the course of that excellent work, his lordship thus expresses himself: "Jeremiah is said to be set over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant; because he was authorised to make known the purposes and decrees of God, and because these events would follow in consequence of his prophecies. Make the heart of his people fat, is therefore as much as to say, Denounce my judgments upon this people, that their heart shall be fat, and their ears heavy, and their eyes shut; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and convert, and be healed." Vol. i. Dissert. 8.—And a few pages after, it follows: "We see that the great empires, which in their turn subdued and oppressed the people of God, are all come to ruin; because, though they executed the purposes of God, yet that was more than they understood. All they intended was to satiate scriptural examples which might be given, I infer, that God's decrees, and the necessity of event flowing thence, neither destroy the true free-agency of men, nor render the commission of sin a jot less heinous. They neither force the human will, nor extenuate the evil of human actions. Predestination, foreknowledge, and providence, only secure the event, and render it certainly future, in a way and manner (incomprehensible indeed by us; but) perfectly consistent with the nature of the second causes. The freedom of intelligent beings does by no means stand opposed to simple necessity; but only to violence and compulsive force. Thus the Son of man went κατα το ωρισμενον, according to what was decreed concerning him, and yet a woe was denounced against Judas who betrayed him, Luke xxii. 22, which woe could not have been denounced, much less inflicted, if Judas, notwithstanding the decree of God, had not betrayed him freely, and with the full consent of his own depraved will. These two therefore, are, in fact, quite reconcilable: viz. absolute determination on the part of God; and libentia, or freedom in action, on the part of man. (e) their own pride and ambition, their own cruelty and revenge." Ibid. p. 241.

Let us next hear the learned dean of Norwich; who, treating of Julius Caesar, has this observable remark: "Many of his enterprizes being entered upon with great rashness, this abundantly proves that he owed the success which he had in them only to an over-ruling power of Providence on his side: which, having set him up as a fit instrument for the work which he brought to pass, carried him through all dangers and hazards, to the full accomplishing of it; and after that, when there was no more for him to do, cast him off to perish, like a rod which is thrown into the fire when no more to be used. The work was God's: but it being malice and ambition that excited him to be the instrument in the execution of it, he justly had, for the reward thereof, the destruction by which he fell." Connection, part 2. B. 7. p. (mec.) 700, 701.

Rollin follows. "The omnipotence of God [is] manifested by the creation, preservation, and government of the world; by the sovereign power he exercises, not only over what is outward and visible, but over the heart and mind, in turning them as he pleases, from one resolution to another, according to his designs." Belles Lettres, vol. ii. p. 323. octav. 1769. "It is thus that God, the sole arbitrator of all human events, determines, as Lord of all, the fate of empires; prescribes the form of them, regulates their limits, marks out their duration, and makes the very passions and crimes of men subservient to the execution of his gracious and just designs: and, by the secret springs of his admirable wisdom, disposes, at a distance, and without man's being sensible of it, the preparations for the great work to which all the rest relate, which is the establishment of his Church, and salvation of his elect." Ibid. vol. iii. p. 225.—Elsewhere, this fine writer has these solid reflections: "The kings who gloried so much in their puissance, have nothing which approaches in the least to that of Jesus Christ. They do not reign over the will of man, which is real dominion. He exercises his power principally on the hearts and minds of men. Nothing is done without his order or permission. Every thing is disposed by his wisdom and power. Every thing co-operates, directly or indirectly, to the accomplishment of his designs. Whilst all things are in motion, and fluctuate upon earth; while states and empires pass away with incredible rapidity, and the human Sinners are as much responsible to God for their offences, as if God had never passed any decree at all. So that the mock objection drawn from "sparks and stones" is totally unparallel; and, therefore, totally inconclusive.

I mean unparallel as an objection; and as applied to that particular purpose for which Mr. Wesley introduces it. Otherwise, there are passages of Scripture wherein even the rational creature man is, under certain circumstances, and in certain respects, actually and expressly compared to the sparks that fly upward (see Job v. 7, and Isa. i. 31), and to stones which necessarily descend downward. The holy Baptist, without any ceremony or scruple, compared some of his unregenerate hearers to stones; saying, God is able, of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham: Matt. iii. 9; intimating that nothing short of divine ability can savingly convert the soul; and that unrenewed sinners can no more change themselves into saints than stones can transform themselves into men. Nay, even the regenerate are (though with some diversity of modification) exhibited under a similar image: Ye, therefore, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Teaching us, that although, by virtue of grace received, men are subsequently active and diligent in every good word and work; yet that, in their first reception of saving grace, poor free-will has no employ: but that the receivers of grace are absolutely passive, and that conversion is as totally the operation of God, as the severing of stones from their native quarry, and the erecting of them into an elegant building, are the effects of human agency. Nay, God the Father himself condescends (at least, as we render the passage) to speak of his elect people under a simile nearly allied to the foregoing: They shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, i. e. I will publicly own them as such, in that day when I make up my jewels. Mal. iii. 17. Now, unless I am vehemently mistaken, jewels are but another name for precious stones. On the whole, Mr. Wesley's daring to hammer out on the very anvil of Scripture, a cavil against the decrees of God; a cavil, partly made of Scripture metaphors; looks so like a wish to turn the Bible's own artillery against itself, as leaves too much room to fear that it is as natural to him to pervert and gainsay, as it is for a spark to ascend, a feather to float, or a stone to sink.

He brings to my mind however an anecdote equally instructive in itself, and pertinent to the case in hand. Two very eminent clergymen who are, and have long been, distinguished ornaments of the Church of England, were conversing together, some years ago, concerning predestination and invincible grace. One of these excellent persons (who was at that time an Arminian) said to the other, in the warmth of free debate, "Pray, sir, do not make me an absolute machine. Allow me to have a little more power of self-determination than a stock or stone!" To which his learned friend replied, "Indeed, sir, a stone has the advantage of you. Man's rebellious heart is, by nature, and so far as spiritual things are concerned, more untractable and unyielding than a stone itself. I may take up a stone and throw it this way or that, in what direction I please; and it obeys the impulse of my arm. Whereas in the sinner's heart there is every species of hatred and opposition to God; nor can any thing but omnipotent power slay its enmity and supersede its resistance." Hence God's gracious promise to renew his people runs in this remarkable style: I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh. Ezek. xxxvi. 26.

Still Mr. Wesley asserts with a "positively" (which, to be sure, is demonstration), that on the scheme of pre-ordination, the reprobate "can have no sin at all." Indeed! They are quite sinless, are they? As perfect as Mr. Wesley himself? Oh! excellent reprobation! Let not Mr. John, who is so fiery an advocate for sinless perfection, ever open his mouth against such a preterition as this! It is one of his own consequences (a consequence which, however, like the rest, remains unproved) that God's decree makes the reprobate themselves free from sin. What then must the elect be? And how does it ensue from those premises, that the former shall perish, "do what they can; and the latter be saved, be they ever so wicked?— Besides: If reprobates be sinless; if they be not merely nominal but real perfectionists; nay, immutably perfect, so that they can have "no sin at all;" will it not follow that Mr. Wesley's own perfectionists are reprobates? For surely if reprobates may be sinless, the sinless may be reprobates. Did not Mr. John's malice outrun his craft, when he advanced an objection so extremely unguarded and so easily retortible?

But on what is the sinlessness of reprobates supposed to depend? On two asser-race vainly employed in the external view of these things, are also drawn in by the same torrent, almost without perceiving it; there passes, in secret, an order and disposition of things, unknown and invisible, which, however, determine our fate to all eternity. The duration of ages has no other end than the formation of the bodies of the elect, which arguments and tends daily towards perfection. When it shall receive its final accomplishment by the death of the last of the elect: Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father." Conclusion of Ancient History, p. 297, 298. Edit. 1768. What kingdom is that, which Christ as mediator, shall deliver up to God the Father? It is, says this admirable author, "the blessed and holy company of the elect." Polite Lettres, vol. ii. p. 304.

tions of mine: which, fairly quoted, are very unfavourable both to the consequence and to the consequence-drawer.

1. I have said in Zanchius that predestination (taken in its most comprehensive import) may be defined, that eternal, most wise, and immutable decree of God, whereby he did, from before all time, determine and ordain to create, dispose of, and direct to some particular end, every person and thing, to which he has given, or is yet to give, being: and to make the whole creation subservient to, and declarative of, his own glory. Said I this of myself? says not Scripture the same also? The Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil. Prov. vi. 14. But do the righteous likewise fall under an unalterable decree? Yes: for it is written, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. Eph. i. 11. And indeed either this is true, or there is no governor of the world. Unless God does actually work all things after the counsel of his own will, i. e. "dispose of, and direct to some particular end, every person and thing to which he hath given being;" Providence is no more than an empty name. Upon the plan of Mr. Wesley's Consequence, the wretch was not a fool, but wise, who said in his heart, There is no God. I defy the Pelagian to strike out a middle way between providence and chance. If God does not dispose of every being, and of every event, so as to "make the whole creation subservient to, and declarative of, his own glory;" chance, not providence, reigns. Prove but this, that chance is paramount: and maintain the existence of God, if you can. Why did the heathens themselves justly deem Epicurus an atheist? Not because he denied the being of God (for he asserted that); but because he denied the agency of God's universal providence. Yet predestination and providence do by no means annihilate sin. The doctrine only affirms that, through the unsearchable wisdom of the great superintending mind, even the efficacious permission of evil shall, in the end, be over-ruled to good. I cannot, moreover, but observe how wretchedly Mr. Wesley's Consequences clash together, and destroy each other. In this very paper, he revives the old impudent cavil, that predestination makes God the author of sin. "Whose fault was it," says he, "that Judas betrayed Christ? You plainly say it was not his fault, but God's." Without the least heat or emotion, I plainly say, Mr. Wesley lies. I never even thought nor intimated, much less said (least of all, said plainly) that it was "God's fault and not the fault of Judas." But if God's decree and providence are incompatible with sin, inasmuch that the very reprobates themselves "can have no sin at all;" I should be glad to know how God's decree and providence can make him the author of sin? One or other therefore of these cavils must fall; they can never both be true, because they are flat contradictions. On one hand, God cannot be the author of evil, if there is no evil for him to be the author of: and on the other hand, even upon the horrid supposition of his being the author of sin, it would necessarily follow that sin and the decree were perfectly consistent. But the truth is, the consistency of God's decree with the voluntary nature of sin is evident from the many Scripture examples already alleged. I have proved by those that absolute predestination, on the part of God, does not make sin involuntary on the part of man. Consequently, God is not the author of moral evil. I have affirmed before, and I affirm again, that God is the creator of the wicked, but not of their wickedness: he is the author of their being, but not the infuser of their sin. It is most certainly his will (for adorable and unsearchable reasons) to permit sin: but with all possible reverence be it spoken, it should seem that he cannot, consistently with the purity of his nature, the glory of his attributes, and the truth of his declarations, be himself the author of it. Sin, says the apostle, entered into the world by one man: meaning by Adam. Consequently, it was not introduced by the Deity himself, though, without the permission of his will and the concurrence of his providence, its introduction had been impossible. Yet is he not hereby the author of sin so introduced. (f)

2. I am charged with simply and nakedly affirming that God himself did "predestinate them" [the reprobate] "to fill up the measure of their iniquities." Either Mr. Wesley is a very superficial peruser of the pamphlet on which he animadverts, or a very malicious and dishonest one. For is not my true meaning expressly declared where I speak thus? God not only works efficaciously on his elect, that they may will and do that which is well-pleasing in his sight; but does likewise frequently and powerfully suffer the wicked to fill up the measure of their iniquities, by committing

(f) See my Doctrine of Absolute Predestination. It is making God the author of sin! Impudence itself might blush to affirm it. "Oh, but do not you say that God worketh all things in all men, even the wickedness in the wicked?" and that this is one branch of his omnipotence? I answer, No. I do not say so. Neither does Zanchius say so. It is Luther who says, "D. un omnia operari in omnibus etiam mala in impiis:" and the words stand as a quotation from him. "But why did you quote those words at all?" For a very good reason; a reason alleged in the preface to the pamphlet itself: viz. to shew that Luther asserted the doctrine of predestination with much more warmth, and proceeded to much harsher lengths in defending it, than Calvin him self.

fresh sins. In proof of which latter part of the paragraph, I refer there to no fewer than sixteen passages of Scripture: all which are very prudently passed over without notice by the Pelagian methodist.

Can any thing be more certain than (1.) that God actually does work in his own people that which is well-pleasing in his sight (Heb. xiii. 21.)? And is it not equally matter of fact (2.) that he likewise suffers the wicked to fill up the measure of their iniquities? Is not the very phraseology, in which both these propositions are expressed, the positively repeated language of God himself? What was the reason which the Almighty condescended to give to Abraham, why the posterity of the latter should reside for several ages in Egypt prior to their settlement in the promised land? Because, says God, the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full. Gen. xv. 16. Divine sovereignty had determined to permit the Canaanites to arrive at a certain measure of wickedness; nor could they be dispossessed of their country until that measure was filled up. Many centuries after it was revealed to Daniel that the Romans should not be masters of the Grecian empire, and thereby be at full liberty to turn their arms against Judea, until the transgressors are come to the full, i. e. until the sinfulness of the latter was consummated, and they fully ripe for destruction: Dan. viii. 23, 24. If we descend to the age of the Messiah's incarnation, we shall find the Son of God himself speaking in the same awful terms: Fill ye up the measure of your fathers, was his tremendous language to the reprobate Jews, Matth. xxiii. 32. Of the same people St. Paul has the same expression, where he observes, that the Jews did all they could to obstruct the ministry of Christ's faithful messengers: forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always, for wrath is come upon them to the uttermost. 1 Thess. ii. 16. As long as my humble efforts in behalf of truth speak the sense and bear the stamp of Scripture, it matters not though ten thousand Wesleys were to rave and rail.

The Arminian had still one more desperate push to make in favour of his sinking Consequence. To this end, I am introduced as saying, "That God decreed the Jews to be the crucifiers of Christ and Judas to betray him." How! the Jews to be the crucifiers of Christ! They were not: nor do I any where call them so. Every body knows that the Romans were the murderers of the Lord of glory, though they became such at Jewish instigation. I am once more under a necessity of quoting myself. God efficaciously permitted (having so decreed), i. e. having decreed to permit the Jews to be in effect the crucifiers of Christ, and Judas to betray him (g). Christ could not have been betrayed and crucified had not his prodition and crucifixion been permitted. And if permitted then the permission must have been decreed. For it were impiety equivalent to atheism to suppose that God permits any thing against his will: and the will of an all-wise unchangeable being is and must be eternal. If any new design (be it a design of efficiency or of permission) can have place in God, God is no longer unchangeable. Nay God would be no longer immortal: for as the learned and judicious Mr. Polhill (h) observes, "every change is a kind of death." Whoever undergoes any alteration dies to that he was before and which he changes from. In such a case," says that eminent master in Israel, "must there not fall a change upon the very being of God himself? and must not the Deity suffer, and as it were die, in this mutation? which astonishing catastrophes being for ever to be abhorred, I conclude that God's decrees must needs be immutable as long as there is any stability in his eternity, infallibility in his prescience, sureness in his grace and truth, and immortality in life or essence."

Mr. Wesley may possibly object that the betraying and death of Christ might be decreed as events, without positively fixing on the particular instruments by whom those events should be brought about. As if God would fix the end, without any effectual regard to the means! Would even a wise man act in this manner? Much less he who is wisdom itself. Judas was expressly pointed out as the traitor, by Christ himself: he that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me. Matt. xxvi. 23. And this unhappy person, though chosen to the apostleship (John vi. 70.), was never chosen to salvation: whence that of our Lord, I speak not of you all; I know whom I have chosen; but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, he that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me, John xiii. 18. Nor was Judas ever ended with saving faith: Jesus knew from the beginning who they were that believed not, and who should betray him: and he said, Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto me

(g) Doctr. of Abs. Pred. vol. v. p. 262.

(h) In his admirable Treatise on The Divine Will considered in its eternal Decrees and holy Execution of them. This great writer was a lay-gentleman of considerable family and fortune, seated at Burwash in Sussex. Another Treatise of his, entitled, Precious Faith considered in its Nature, Workings and Growth, is one of the finest and most evangelical books on that important subject, that is to be met with in the English language. If the volume I first mentioned, speaks to the head, and ransacks almost all the stores of learning and genius; the latter speaks no less to the heart, and unlocks the richest treasures of experimental grace.—The author flourished in the reign of Charles II.

(i. e. no man savingly believe in me) unless it were given unto him of my Father. Hence, Judas is termed the son of perdition; and, when he died, is said to have gone to his own place. Should such awful passages as these excite us to blaspheme and reply against God? Should they not rather make us fall prostrate at his footstool, and cry, each for himself, in the dust of penitential abasement, God be merciful to me a sinner?—The Son of Man, said Incarnate Wisdom, goeth (i. e. dieth the death of the cross) as it was written of him καθω γεγραπωται περι αυτου, as it was decreed concerning him; but woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed: it were good for that man if he had never been born, Matt. xxvi. 24. Now, notwithstanding the absolute decree, and notwithstanding Judas undesignedly fulfilled it, had he not been, in the midst of all, an accountable agent, a woe could not possibly have been denounced against him: much less such a woe as should render even non-existence a privilege. I infer therefore, from Christ's own words, that men are at once subject to God's disposal as a predestinator; and amenable to his tribunal as a law-giver.

When St. Peter declared that Christ was delivered up to death by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God (Acts ii. 23.), it is worthy of observation that he declared this on the very day of Pentecost, immediately after the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost. The apostle, therefore, was under the absolute impulse of that blessed person. Nay, he was filled with the Holy Spirit, and spake as that Spirit gave him utterance. Consequently, in the judgment of the Holy Spirit himself, there is no real incompatibility between God's determinate counsel and the wickedness of their hands who bring that counsel to pass. Mr. Wesley's frequent repetitions of the same threadbare objections oblige me, oftener than I could wish, to repeat my answers.

Be it, so, then, that mortals are at present too short-sighted entirely to comprehend, and fully to discern, how the efficacious purposes of heaven are perfectly consistent with the moral responsibility of man. It is plain from Meridian evidence of Scripture that they are so: and this ought to satisfy those who believe that the Scriptures are of God. Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker: let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth; but shall the clay say to him that fashioned it, What makest thou? Isa. xlv. 9. Shall we, with Mr. Wesley, labour to quench the light we have, and fly in the face of Scripture? and give God himself the lie, by way of desperate revenge for his not having made us omniscient? Nay; but may we, with fear and trembling, adore the deep things of God, until death takes off the veil. May divine grace make us believers on earth of what in heaven we trust to be comprehenders: nor suffer us to be carried away with that strong delusion, that monstrous system of Arminianism, which (in open defiance of all Scripture, reason and fact) represents God as accountable to man, under pretence of making man accountable to God.

"God determined," says the Pelagian, "that the reprobate should live and die in their sins, that he might afterwards damn them!" Say rather, that some men are permitted to live and die in their sins, the consequence of which is condemnation.—As to the horrid parallel, which Mr. W. labours to run between the Most High God, and one of the most abandoned emperors that ever disgraced the Roman diadem—I have only this to remark: 1. That the writer who is capable of taking such blasphemous liberties with the adorable Sovereign of heaven and earth must have drunk deep indeed into that satanic spirit which opposeth and exalteth itself above all that is called God. 2. The whole parallel is copied almost verbatim from an old book, first published in the reign of Charles I., A. D. 1633, by one Samuel Hoord, alias Hoard, alias Hord (for I find him bearing all these names in print). He was a clergyman of the Laudean faction, and, by way of cover for his apostacy, (having been originally a zealous maintainer of the xxxix Articles), printed the above-mentioned treatise, commonly known by the title of "God's love to mankind." From which treatise Mr. Wesley borrowed his whole paragraph concerning God and Tiberius; but without giving it as a quotation, or cropping the least hint to his readers that the comparison was none of his own. Nothing comes amiss to this gentleman, Not content with assaulting the living, he even rifles the dead: and, rather than not rifle at all, robs them of their very blasphemies. Unless he goes upon the old fanatic principles, that brethren should have all things in common. 3. I am saved from the trouble of canvassing Mr. Hoord's simile; it having been effectually done to my hands by no less persons than the renowned Dr. Davenant, bishop of Salisbury, and that prodigy of metaphysical learning, the ever memorable Dr. Twisse, who condescended to immortalize Hoord's name, by their candid, solid and learned answers. For the refutation of that particular calumny against God, which Mr. Wesley's plagiarism has adopted for his own, I shall content myself with referring the reader to the treatises of those great and eminent champions of grace. (i) It may be worth a moment's while, however to trace the pedigree of the impious comparison. Bertius (k) (as Dr. Twisse observes) objected it long before to the celebrated Piscator, by whom it was amply refuted. Hoord copied it from Bertius, and Mr. Wesley cribbed it from Hoord. I congratulate the reader on his sight of land. We are come now to the

(i) See Bishop Davenant's Animadversions, &c., p. 150. edit. 1641.—And Dr. Twisse's Riches of God's Love to the vessels of Mercy, p. 23, 24. edit. 1653. fol

V. and last Consequence, viz., that on the principle of absolute predestination there can be "no future judgment." Here again the Consequence is false. For absolute predestination is the very thing that renders the future judgment certain: God hath appointed [εξηγεσεν, hath fixed] a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained [ωρισε, decreed:] Acts xvii. 31.—Nay, says Mr. John, "It requires more pains than all the men upon earth and all the devils in hell will ever be able to take:" viz. to reconcile the doctrine of reprobation with the doctrine of a judgment day. Be not quite so fiery, meek Mr. John. It might perhaps be for your interest (and it certainly would for that of "the devils in hell") to find that reprobates cannot be judged. But feed not yourself with such delusive hope. I have already shewn that even the most flagrant sinners sin voluntarily, notwithstanding the inevitable accomplishment of God's effective and permissive decrees. Now they who sin voluntarily are accountable: and accountable sinners are judicable: and if judicable, they are punishable. Be content therefore with conjuring back the ghosts of Peter Bertius, Samuel Hoord, Gregory Lopez, John Goodwin, and Thomas Grantham. The second-hand arguments which you so industriously cull from these and such like heroes, are quite sufficient (though not to prove your doctrines, yet) to convince us of your zeal and your abilities without your calling up "all the devils in hell" to augment your train. Besides, the testimony of the latter would do you no good: for they were liars from the beginning. I wish your own future regard to truth may give us reason to hope that they have nothing to do with you nor you with them.

God "had determined," says the objector, that the reprobate should "continue impenitent. Their ignorance of God, and the things of God, was not wilful, but owing to the sovereign will of God. God had absolutely decreed before they were born that they should live and die in unbelief. God himself unalterably decreed that they should not love either God or man. Their repeated iniquities and transgressions were in effect his own act and deed."—Flagrant misrepresentation throughout. The utmost our doctrine amounts to is that the Omniscient mind (to whom all things are, and ever were, present at once) considering the human race as fallen, was pleased to ordain the recovery of an innumerable multitude, and to leave the rest unrestrained. So that, with regard to the former, mercy is glorified in their election, redemption, sanctification, and eternal happiness: as justice is in the condemnation of the latter, for their impenitence, unbelief, and disobedience. "Oh, but could they ever repent, believe, and obey?" I am not afraid to answer with the word of God, that repentance, faith, and sanctification, are God's own gifts, which he is not bound to bestow on any man, and might have withheld from all men. Where these graces are given, rectitude and happiness follow: where they are not given, sin and misery continue to reign. Given they are to some, or none would have them. Given they are not to all, else none would be without them. The regenerate work the works of God with consent, freedom, and desire, in consequence of grace bestowed; the unregenerate commit evil with no less desire, freedom, and consent, in consequence of that original depravation which God (for unfathomable reasons) was pleased to permit, and which nothing but his own grace can effectually supersede. Which grace he vouchsafes to and withholds from, whom he pleases.

Neither election, on the one hand, nor reprobation on the other, will be found to clash with the process of the final judgment. Not election: for Christ himself will preach election from the judgment-seat. Come ye blessed of my Father (why blessed of his Father, in particular? because election was God the Father's act), inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Matt. xxv. 34.—Nor reprobation: for God's decree of preterition (evinced by the voluntary transgressions of the persons passed by), will be solemnly appealed to, in that great and terrible day. Whosoever was not found written in the Book of Life, was cast into the lake of fire. Rev. xx. 15.

So much for Mr. John Wesley and his Consequences. A few words in my turn, concerning Calvinism and Arminianism in general; and then for the present, manum de tabula.

It might naturally enough be expected

(k) This was the same Peter Bertius, who pronounced Arminius's Funeral Oration (vide ips. Orat. Arminii Operib. præfix.) and some years after, rendered his Arminianism complete, by openly declaring himself a Papist: see Archbishop Usher's Letters, subjoined to his life by Dr. Parr, let. 56, and 53. p. 28 and 85.—This Bertius had long figured at the head of the Arminian faction, and had particularly distinguished himself by a treatise against Final Perseverance, entitled Hymæus Desertor. To which latter circumstance Archbishop Usher smartly alludes, where he observes (at supr.), that in concerning Roman Catholic Bertius did verify the title of his own book.

that a man who is so liberally lamentable in his outcries against the doctrine of predestination, and carries to such horrid length his invectives against the purposes and providence of God, should himself adopt, and be fairly able to propose a scheme of salvation exempt even from the appearance of that unmercifulness which he affects to find in the scheme of those from whom he so violently dissents. But what if the reverse be true? What if that very Arminian doctrine asserted by Mr. Wesley should, on a near inspection, be fairly convicted of not only apparent but real unmercifulness? even of more and greater than malice itself can charge on the most distorted portrait of Calvinism? This I, some pages back, engaged to make good. All passion and prejudice apart, let us coolly and candidly address ourselves to the enquiry.

According to Mr. Wesley's own fundamental principle of universal grace, grace itself, or the saving influence of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of men, does and must become the ministration of eternal death to thousands and millions. That I do not wrong Mr. Wesley, in asserting this, shall be proved from his own words: or rather from the words of Mr. Robert Barclay, the celebrated quaker; from whose apology for that people, Mr. Wesley (without mentioning the name of his author) hath pirated a little Tractate, price 2d. and to which he hath given the title of Serious Considerations on Absolute Predestination. In this Tractate, pirated as aforesaid, Mr. Wesley thus expresses himself (p. 13.): "He [i. e. God] hath given to every man a measure of light and grace; which, if it is not resisted, will work the salvation of all: but if it is, will become their condemnation." So then there is such a thing as condemning grace, or grace that eventually damns some unhappy persons on whom it is (most kindly!) bestowed. A very odd species of grace indeed. It would be just as sound divinity, and as sound sense, to talk of a damning salvation, as of damning grace. Surely such a kind of grace as this, a grace which (as Mr. Wesley himself acknowledges) is too often baffled and foiled by the will of man, and, of course, eventually conducive to sink him deeper into everlasting ruin, had much better not have been given or offered, than offered or given to increase the condemnation of those upon whom it is conferred! "Oh, but God does not give his grace with a view to increase their condemnation who reject it: so far from this, he seriously intended that it shall, and earnestly desires that it may, work them into a state of salvation. Which it will do if they are willing to admit it and improve it." I would only ask you one plain question. Does God know, or does he not, previous to, and at that time of this supposed gift or offer, whether the persons, to whom the offer is made, will or will not reject it? Let us have no equivocation. No shuffling. No evasion. No shifting of terms.

If you say, "God does not know what the event will be;" I give you up for incurable. It is less impious to deny the very existence of God, than to strip him of his omniscience and thereby make him (as far as in you lies) such an one as yourself. By pleading divine ignorance (I shudder at the very idea), you certainly slip out of my hands: and it is the only way by which you can. But your escape costs you very dear. In flying from Calvinism, you jump into atheism.

If you say, that "God does know what the issue will be, and that he deliberately offers or designedly implants (no matter which) his grace to or in a person who, he certainly knows, will augment his guilt by finally resisting the grace so offered or implanted;"—then where, oh where, is the goodness of God? I see not the least trace of it. But I see enough of its reverse: unless love and hatred, mercy and cruelty are terms synonymous.—To harp on the old string, and allege that "grace is not offered that it may increase condemnation," would be nothing to the purpose. So far is it from being able to turn the balance in your favour, that it is "lighter than the breath of a fly." If God knows that the offered grace will be rejected, it would be mercy to forbear the offer. Prove the contrary if you are able.

As I trust there is no man who dares, on mature consideration, to deny the all-comprehending foreknowledge or (if you had rather have it so expressed) the omniscience of God; I will venture to take that attribute for granted: and argue from it as from a principle assumed. To this end I shall put the following case.

That ever blessed Being, to whom all futurities are known from everlasting, knew (we will suppose) that a man named Tiberius, would be born at such a time, of such parents, and live in such a place. God knew, moreover (even before this person had being), that he would obstinately resist and reject the influences of grace, though seriously proposed [I argue on the Arminian principle] and tendered to his acceptance: that he would by no means admit it, or be guided by it, though God sincerely wished he would, and used all feasible methods for that purpose. And yet it seems God actually offers grace to this man: nay even draws him (i. e. according to the Arminian notion of divine traction, God solicits, propounds motives, excites and would fain have him) to accept of it. But why this waste of divine influence? Is it to add to iniquities already too great? and to seal destruction already so sure? Can God be in earnest, in offering grace to one who, he infallibly knows beforehand, will infallibly refuse it, and therefore will never be the better, but much the worse, for the offer? or can it be from a principle of loving-kindness that the Deity is supposed to tamper (for tampering it is) with Tiberius by an offer of grace, which the Omniscient Offerer knows will be ineffectual? "Oh, but men are hereby made inexcusable." Be it so: yet surely God can never be thought knowingly to render a man more inexcusable by taking such measures as will certainly load him with accumulated condemnation, out of mere love to that man!

Let those, then, who plead for such grace as this, forbear to charge the asserters of special and efficacious vocation with representing the Deity as unmerciful: and, for common decency's sake, cease to tax the doctrine we plead for with tyranny and cruelty. Might I dare to accommodate those awful words to the present occasion, I would say to the patrons of ineffectual grace, weep not for us, but weep for yourselves. Level your tragical exclamations about unmercifulness at your own scheme, which truly and properly deserves them. I appeal to the judgment of every capable and unprejudiced man, which system is most worthy of God? the Arminian one, which represents the Father of mercies as offering grace to them who, he knows, will only add sin to sin, and make themselves two-fold more the children of hell by refusing it; or our's which, in perfect harmony with the Scriptures, asserts that grace is given to those only who, by that very grace so given them, are made willing to receive it, and in whom it is a well of water springing up into holiness, good works, and life everlasting?

Justly does the great Calvin exclaim against the weakness and absurdity of those reasoners who, while they affect to be "such conscientious advocates for the [mercy and] justice of God, stumble at every straw that lies in their way (1):" but when they have a turn to serve, or an idol-opinion of their own to set up, "make nothing of jumping over massy beams," and fighting through thick and thin. For God to restrain the operations of grace to them who shall actually be saved is "partiality and injustice." But to offer, and even to give, his grace to those that will certainly reject and make an ill use of it, and thereby render it the means of greater condemnation; this is "mercy, goodness, compassion and tender loving-kindness!" In this manner does Arminianism strain at gnats and swallow camels! even by representing grace itself as the administration of complicated sin and accumulated ruin to millions and millions of Adam's posterity. While honest Calvinism makes grace the real administration of present holiness and endless happiness to all on whom it is conferred. The former turns the very goodness of God into eventual poison. The latter only affirms that the non-elect are left in a state of nature, without the addition of ineffectual grace to double the measure of their sin and misery, and that with regard to the elect, whose millions are countless by man, God both intends their regeneration, and actually effects it by the omnipotence of his love. On the whole we must, 1. either deny the omniscience of God (and we may as well deny his existence outright); or 2. make grace itself the designed ministration of death to unnumbered myriads of men; or 3. acknowledge, with Scripture, that God is the sovereign dispenser of his own grace; that this grace is divinely effectual; and, consequently, that God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy.

I have often wondered how so many good people, who would start at Arianism, can so glibly swallow, and so easily digest, Arminianism. "Oh, but Mr. John has told us that Arminians are not Arians." True; all Arminians are not; though very many of them are. Most Arians, however, are Arminians, though some Arminians are not Arians. Arianism robs two of the divine persons. Arminianism robs all the three: If Arianism robs the Son and Spirit of their proper deity; Arminianism robs the Father of his sovereignty, decrees and providence: the Son of his efficacy as a Saviour: and the Spirit of his efficacy as a Sanctifier. An Arian represents the Son and Spirit as dependents on God the Father; an Arminian represents God the Father as dependent on the wills of men for the accomplishment of his desires, God the Son as dependent on the wills of men for the success of his mediation, and God the Spirit as dependent on the wills of men for the success of his agency.

Arianism and Arminianism, like water and ice, have a natural tendency to produce each other. Nor was it without reason, that a very able (m) advocate for the doctrine of the Trinity traces, in the preface to his excellent work on that subject, both the Arianism and the Deism of the age to Arminianism, as the grand source of both. The reader, I am persuaded, will not only excuse, but approve, my laying before him a short extract from that masterly preface, which I the rather do, as it may be a means of acquainting some with a certain truth they do not seem aware of: viz. that the trite, common-place objection to predestination, drawn from the plausible topics of partiality, unmercifulness and injustice, does, if admitted at all, conclude as strongly against the whole Christian revelation as against the doctrines of grace in particular.

(1) Bonos istos justitiæ Dei patronos perplexos hæcære in festucâ, altas verò trabes superare nimis absurdum est. Calv. Instit. 1. 3. c. 23. § 7.

(m) The present learned, worthy and venerable Mr. Sloss, of Nottingham.

The argument by which some men "are induced to deny the doctrine of election, will, with equal force, conclude with the Deists against all revealed religion: and, according to their [i. e. the Arminian] way of reasoning, it is impossible that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament can be a revelation from God: because it is not made to all mankind. If it be essential to the goodness and equity of the divine nature for God to have an equal regard to all his creatures; and if he is so tied up by those perfections that he cannot, in his sovereignty and free grace, bestow peculiar and distinguishing favours on those upon whom he pleases to fix his love; then he must either not make any revelation at all, or else that revelation must be made to every individual of the human race. But, since it is plain that the method of salvation, revealed in the Scriptures, is not made known to every individual [of mankind]; it would follow by necessary consequence [from the above principle] that the Scripture cannot be a revelation from God: because his perfections, as is supposed, would oblige him to make those Scriptures equally known to all men.—Those therefore who deny the doctrine of election upon this principle, that it is inconsistent with that goodness, equity and justice, which are essential to the divine nature, whereby he regards equally all his creatures; are obliged, upon the same principle, to deny that the Scriptures are a divine revelation. If election be denied, because it makes a difference among those who [are supposed to] have an equal claim to the divine favour; it must be no less inconsistent with the goodness and justice of God to make any such revelation to any part of mankind, whereby their condition is made better than others of the human race to whom that revelation is not made known. Which [way of reasoning in either case] throws the greatest reflection on the whole conduct of Divine Providence in all those instances of it, whereby the condition of any of God's reasonable creatures is made better than the state of others; and cuts off entirely the sovereignty of the Supreme Being, by which he dispenses his favours to his creatures at pleasure, without trespassing on the equity and righteousness of his nature; since none of them have any claim to the least favour above another, by any thing in themselves, which they are possessed of independently of him who alone maketh any to differ. Since then the same arguments, made use of by some Protestants against the doctrine of the free grace of God in the eternal election of a part of the apostate race of Adam, hold with equal force against all divine revelation, and, consequently, against all Christianity; they would do well to consider how far they may have contributed to the prevailing deism of this present time, by furnishing the adversaries of divine revelation (who know very well how to improve any advantage against the truth) with arguments against Christianity in general." Thus far this calm and judicious reasoner.

As Arminianism fails in its attempts to magnify the divine mercy, so is it equally deficient in its pretences to promote human sanctity. Election ensures holiness to a very great part of mankind: whereas precarious grace, deriving all its efficacy from the caprice of free-will, could not ensure holiness to any one individual of the whole species. "Oh but some people, presuming upon election, neglect sanctification." This is much easier said than proved. Admitting it however to be a possible case, shall we mend the matter a single jot by going over to Arminianism? Let us examine: "The goodness of God is unlimited in its exercise; and Christ died to atone for all the sins of all mankind: moreover, every man is endued, either by nature or grace, with such liberty of will as to turn to God, if it be not his own fault." Surely these doctrines (I will not say necessarily, but) naturally carry a very gentle aspect on neglect of morals. They are, to say the very least, liable to vast abuse. "Oh, but if the doctrines are abused, it is owing, not to the doctrines, but to men of corrupt minds." It may be so. And will not the same remark hold equally true of the opposite doctrines? It will hold still truer. For no man, according to our system, has a right to look upon himself as elected until sanctifying grace has converted him to faith and good works. Consequently the doctrine of election is not so liable even to speculative abuse as the doctrine which asserts that "God loves every man alike, and that Christ died for the sins of all mankind." I speak it without the least intention either to grieve or offend any: but it is too true that several remarkable transactions have very lately happened in the Arminian world (I mean in that part of it which is supposed to be more holy than the rest), which transactions too plainly proved, notwithstanding many truly conscientious people are Arminians, that Arminianism and good works are by no means so nearly related as some folks imagine. Indeed, the farther we extend our observation, the more we must be convinced of this. Arminianism was never more rampant in England since the reformation than at present. And I appeal to every man, whether virtue is not as much on the decline? Like alternate buckets, the one rises as the other falls.

Suppose we carry back our investigation from the present century to the last? In the last century, Arminianism was confined to much narrower bounds, and lay in much fewer hands than now. Yet where it did obtain, its influence on morals too often resembled the agency of a blast on the blossom. Even the candid Mr. Hickman mentions an instance of it. "This," says that excellent writer, "was the refuge and χρησφύδεται of that grand propagator of Arminianism, Mr. Thomson. When he was in a fit of intemperance, if any one reminded him of the wrath of God threatened against such courses, he would answer, I am a child of the devil to-day; but I have free-will; and to-morrow I will make myself a child of God (n)."

"Oh, but if we hold free-will, we do not hold final perseverance. It is perseverance that throws open the flood-gates of licentiousness." How can that be? It is neither licentious, nor absurd, to suppose, 1. that the truly righteous are the peculiar care of God. And, 2. that, being his peculiar care, they are kept by his power through faith unto salvation (1 Pet. i. 3, 4, 5.): so kept as to be preserved fruitful in every good word and work. Now if to persevere in every good word and work be the turn-pike road to licentiousness, then I grant that the doctrine of perseverance is a licentious doctrine. When holiness and sin are one and the same thing, then and not until then, will continuance in the former open a door to the latter.—But why do I detain my reader and myself, in wasting arguments on Mr. Wesley? The man who did not blush to call even the exemplary Mr. Hervey an Antinomian may well be supposed to hurl the name, indiscriminately, at the head of every one who says, with St. Paul, By grace ye are saved through faith and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works; which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them. Eph. ii. 8, 9, 10.

Let us now hear the sum of the whole matter. All things are of God: 2. Cor. v. 18. He is the efficacious ordainer of good: he is the wise and voluntary permitter of evil. There is no good of which he is not the author: there is no evil of which he is not the permitter. Consequently it is a first principle of the Bible, and of sound reason, that "whatever is, is right;" or will answer, some great end (an end at present unknown) in its relation to the whole, and at the final result of things. I must, even as a rational being, and much more as a Christian, repeat, and continue to insist upon, that celebrated maxim (under certain modifications); notwithstanding the controversial dust it has raised among the Arminians of Mr. Wesley's predicament, and among some small divines elsewhere. Nor will I ever give up that maxim, until I can see the conduct of Divine Providence fairly vindicated without its help.—You may say perhaps, with a late great and good man, that "the disposals of Providence are undoubtedly right." Allowed. But is there any thing in which Providence has no concern? If there be, tell us what that thing is. If there be not, then it unavoidably follows that "whatever is, is right," in some respect or other. Even Grotius himself found it absolutely necessary to grant this (o): else, as that learned man plainly saw, he must have left a very dangerous breach in the fortifications of Christianity.

It was even right that Mr. Wesley should be permitted to charge me with blasphemies I abhor, with positions I never wrote, and with consequences which my principles cannot produce. "Then why do you rap his knuckles for so doing?" Because, even upon my own maxim, it was no less right that his knuckles should be rapped. Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, one day thrashed his servant for pilfering. The fellow, knowing his master was a fatalist, thought to bring himself off by alledging that he was "destined to steal, and therefore ought not to be beat for it."—"You are destined to steal, are you?" answered the philosopher; "then you are no less destined to be thrashed for it;" and laid on some hearty blows extraordinary (p).

The motive of the agent is very distinguishable from the eventual tendency of the act. A man who means ill deserves chastisement, even though the ill he means be made (by superior direction) conducive to ultimate good. Should it be objected that, according to the above maxim, "there can be no such thing as ill meaning;" I deny the consequence. Let us weigh the terms of the maxim itself. "Whatever is, is right." Whatever is. Not what has merely an invisible, ideal existence in the mind of the agent; but whatever has a perceptible, outward existence, in the course and train of things. A being possessed of infinite knowledge to discern all consequences; of infinite power to prevent what he pleases; and of infinite goodness to will the best; cannot consistently with those perfections, be supposed to permit any event, without some wise and just view. Of these views, we are by no means competent judges. In a state of superior existence we shall, I doubt not, see the propriety and fitness of divine conduct. Here we know but in part; and in many instances we know nothing at all. Hereafter we shall know, even as we are known. What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter. Wisdom itself never suggested a more certain truth than that with which the following words present us: Behold in this thou art not just: I will answer thee that God is greater than man. Why dost thou strive against him? For he giveth not account of any of his matters. Job xxxiii. 12, 13.

(n) Hickman's Animadv. on Heylin, p. 91, and 227.

(o) Quæ vero permittuntur non carent interinstructu De Vitâ. l. i. f. 19.

(p) See Stanley's Lives of the Philos. p. 296.

"It is very reasonable to believe," said Mr. Addison, "that part of the pleasure which happy minds shall enjoy in a future state will arise from an enlarged contemplation of the divine wisdom in the government of the world, and in a discovery of the sacred and amazing steps of Providence, from the beginning to the end of time. In our present condition, which is a middle state, our minds are as it were, chequered with truth and falsehood; and as our faculties are narrow and our views imperfect, it is impossible but our curiosity must meet with many repulses.

"Visu carentem magna pars veri latet.

"We are not at present in a proper situation to judge of the counsels by which Providence acts: since but little arrives at our knowledge, and even that little we discern imperfectly. Since Providence therefore in its economy regards the whole system of time and things together, we cannot discover the beautiful connections between incidents which lie widely separated in time; and, by losing so many links of the chain, our reasonings become broken and imperfect. Thus those parts in the moral world which have not an absolute, may yet have a relative, beauty in respect of some other parts concealed from us but open to his eye before whom past present and to come are set together in one point of view. And those events the permission of which seems now to accuse his goodness, may, in the consummation of things, both magnify his goodness and exalt his wisdom. And this is enough [at least it ought to be enough] to check our presumption; since it is in vain to apply our measures of regularity to matters of which we know neither the antecedents nor the consequents, the beginning nor the end." Spectator, vol. iii. No. 237.

There is therefore, what Calvin very justly calls a learned ignorance: (q) for it is real wisdom in man to acquiesce, with the most absolute and implicit confidence, in the decrees and dispensations of that God "whose never failing providence," as our Church expresses it, "ordereth all things both in heaven and earth."

I shall close the subject with the following passages: which, though taken from the Apocryphal Book, are pregnant with just reasoning, and speak the language of piety and sense. Let Mr. Wesley listen; and learn for the time to come not to aspers the decrees he cannot comprehend.

Thy heart hath gone too far in this world, and thinkest thou to comprehend the way of the Most High?—And I said unto him, Yea, Lord.—And he answered me and said, I am sent to shew thee three ways, and to set three similitudes before thee: whereof, if thou canst declare me one, I will shew thee also the way thou desirest to see, and I will shew thee from whence the wicked heart cometh. And I said, Tell on, my Lord. Then said he unto me Go thy way: weigh me the weight of the fire; or measure me the blast of the wind; or call me again the day that is past. Then answered I, What man is able to do that? And he said unto me, If I should ask thee how many great dwellings are in the midst of the sea, how many springs are in the beginning of the deep, or how many springs are above the firmament, or which are the out-goings of paradise: peradventure thou wouldst say unto me, I never went down into the deep, nor into hell, neither did I ever climb up into heaven. Nevertheless now have I asked thee but only of the fire and wind, and of the day where through thou hast past, and of things from which thou canst not be separated, and yet canst thou give me no answer of them. Thine own things and such as are grown up with

(q) Eorum enim quæ scire nec datur, nec fas est docta est ignorantia: scientiæ appetentia insanix species Calv. Inst. L. 3. C. 23 § 8.

This passage of Calvin's seems to have given Grotius the first hint of that fine epigram which he entitles Erudita Ignorantia: and which, as it is both exquisitely beautiful in itself, and so closely connected with the subject in hand, I here subjoin.

Qui curiosus postulat totum suæ
Patere menti, ferre qui non sufficit
Mediocritatis conscientiam suæ;
Index iniquus, æstimator est malus
Suique naturæque. Nam rerum parans,

Libanda tantum quæ venit mortalibus,
Nos scire pauca multa mirari jubet.
His primus error auctor est preioribus.
Nam qui fateri nil potest incognitum,
Falso necesse est placet ignorantiam;
Umbrasque inanes capiet inter nubila
Imaginosæ adulter Ixion Dee.
Magis quiescet animus, errabit minus,
Contentus eruditione parabili:
Nec queret illam siqua quarentem fugit.
Nescire quædam magna pars sapientiæ est.
Vide Grotii. Poemat. p. 235.—Ludg. 1639.

theo, canst thou not know? How should thy vessel then be able to comprehend the way of the Highest? And, the world being now outwardly corrupted, to understand the corruption that is evident in my sight? The more thou searchest, the more thou shalt marvel. For the grain of evil seed hath been sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning; and how much ungodliness hath it brought up unto this time! and how much shall it yet bring forth, until the time of threshing come! Ponder now by thyself how great fruit of wickedness the grain of evil seed hath brought forth. And when the ears shall be cut down, which are without number, how great a floor shall they fill!—Then I answered and said, How and when shall these things come to pass?—And wherefore are our years few and evil?—And he answered, Do not thou hasten above the Most Highest: for thy haste is vain, and thou hast much exceeded. Did not the souls also of the righteous ask questions of these things in their chambers, saying, How long shall I hope on this fashion? When cometh the fruit of the floor of our reward? And to these things, Uriel the archangel gave them answer and said, Even when the number of seeds is fulfilled in you: for he hath weighed the world in a balance. By measure he hath measured the times: and by number he hath numbered the times: and he doth not move nor stir them until the said measure be fulfilled. 2 Esdr. iv.

Does God's seeming severity to the non-elect stumble us? It is enough for us to know that infinite wisdom cannot err, and that infinite goodness does all things well. Thou art sore troubled in mind for Israel's sake: lovest thou that people better than he that made them?—And I said, No, Lord; but of very grief have I spoken: for my reins pain me every hour while I labour to comprehend the way of the Most High and to seek out part of his judgment.—And he said unto me, Thou canst not. Number me the things that are not yet come, gather me together the drops that are scattered abroad, make the flowers green again that are withered; open me the places that are closed, and bring forth the winds that are shut up in them, shew me the image of a voice: and then will I declare unto thee the being that thou labourst to know.—And I said, O Lord that bearest rule, who may know these things but he that hath not his dwelling with men? As for me, I am unwise: how am I then to speak of these things whereof thou askest me?—Then said he unto me, Like as thou canst do none of these things that I have spoken of; even so canst thou not find out [on one hand] my judgment [toward the reprobate], nor, in the end, the love which I bear unto my people on the other. 2 Esdr. v.—For thou comest far short [of the implicit duty thou owest to me], that thou shouldst be able to love my creature more than I. Chap. iii. 47.

One word to Mr. Wesley himself, and I have done. Time, Sir, (I am informed) has already whitened your locks: and the hour must shortly come, which will transmit you to the tribunal of that God, on whose sovereignty a great part of your life has been one continued assault. At that bar I too must hold up my hand. Omniscience can tell which of us shall first appear before the Judge of all. I shortly may, you shortly must. The part you have been permitted to act in the religious world will, sooner or later, sit heavy on your mind. “Mixed in the warm converse of life, we think with men: on a death-bed, with God. Depend upon it, a period will arrive when the Father's electing mercy, and the Messiah's adorable righteousness, will appear in your eyes, even in your's, to be the only safe anchorage for a dying sinner. I mean, unless you are actually given over to final obduration. Which I trust you are not; and to which I most ardently beseech God you never may.

You have told us, totidem verbis, that “Men's believing is the cause of their justification:” (r) that “our obeying Christ is the cause of his giving us eternal life:” and that “our obedience to Christ is the cause of his becoming the author of eternal salvation to us.” You have affirmed, speaking of God, that it can never “consist with his unerring wisdom to think that I am innocent, to judge that I am righteous, because another is so. He can no more in this manner confound me with Christ, than with David or Abraham.” (s) Such doctrine may pass well enough, while life and health last: but it will leave us comfortless, hopeless, ruined, in that hour, when heart and flesh fail. Woe be to you, to me, and to all the race of Adam, if the righteousness of Christ will not then stand us in any more stead than the righteousness of David or Abraham! was that really to be the case, how could Mr. Wesley, in that particular, hope for justification at the hands of that God, whom he has impiously compared to “Tiberius” and “the Grand Turk.”

May your name, sir, after all that you have done, be found at last in that Book of Life against which you have so daringly exclaimed! May your person be interested in that only perfect righteousness, on which you have so unhappily trampled! and, as an evidence of your part in both, may your

(r) See Mr. Wesley's Scripture Doctr. of Predestin. P. 7, 8.

(s) See a Sermon concerning Justification, in one of Mr. Wesley's three first volumes of Sermons.

future conduct display the spirit and breathe the language of these excellent lines :

" Let not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts to throw,
And deal damnation round the land
On each I judge thy foe.

If I am right, thy grace impart
Still in the right to stay ;
If I am wrong, O teach my heart
To find that better way." (t)

Be this your supplication. And may your supplication be heard !

(t) Pope's Universal Prayer.

AN OLD FOX TARRED AND FEATHERED ;

OCCASIONED BY WHAT IS CALLED,

MR. JOHN WESLEY'S CALM ADDRESS TO OUR AMERICAN COLONIES.

" In politics I dabble too, Brave Jack of all Trades I."
Cæciliane, Fur. es.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following sheet does not enter, seriously and argumentatively, into the merits of either side of the dispute now pending between England and America. This has already been done by others ; and probably will be by more. The intention of these pages is, 1. To shew Mr. Wesley's honesty, as a Plagiariſt ; and, 2. To raise a little skin, by giving the Fox a gentle flogging as a turn-coat.

SECTION I.

" Another face of things was seen,
And I became a Tory."

WHEREUNTO shall I liken Mr. John Wesley ?
and with what shall I compare him ?

I will liken him unto a low and puny tadpole in divinity, which proudly seeks to disembowel a high and mighty whale in politics.

For it came to pass some months since, that Dr. Samuel Johnson sent forth an eighteen-penny pamphlet entitled, Taxation no Tyranny.

And some days ago, a methodist weathercock saluted the public with a two-penny paper (extracted by whole paragraphs together from the aforesaid doctor), ycleped, A calm Address to our American Colonies. The occasion whereof was this :

There dwelleth about 99 miles, one furlong and thirteen inches from a place called the Foundry in Moorfields (next door to a noted mad-house), a priest named Vulposo.

This priest is a perfect man and an upright : hating forgery, adultery, and covetousness.

Now he happened to buy Dr. Johnson's pamphlet abovementioned : and upon reading thereof he thus mused with himself.

" This tract, called Taxation no Tyranny, cost me one shilling and six-pence.

(a) See some account of this curious transaction in Mr. Topiady's Letter to Mr. John Wesley.

(b) Æsop relates, that a certain vain jack-daw picked up all the peacock's feathers he could meet with, and stuck them among his own : in hope that the elegant spoils might pass for the native productions of his back. The cheat was soon discovered : and the enraged birds not only stripped him of his artificial decorations, but made him feel the vengeance of their bills beside.

" What a man buys and pays for is certainly his own.

" Therefore this tract is no longer its author's, but mine.

" Consequently, I shall do no evil if I gut the substance of it, and republish it under my own name.

" There is an old Greek proverb which saith γνωθι καιρον, Know thy opportunity, and seize it. There is also a Latin poet who saith, Malè dum recitas incipit esse tuum.

" No tense like the present. Doctor Johnson has been for several weeks absent from the kingdom, on a tour to Paris. Therefore it is now or never. Like a mouse that has robbed a pantry, I will venture forth with my stolen morsel while the cat's out of the way.

" Now it is not that I care for government any more than Judas cared for the poor : but I have long wished to be taken notice of at court ; and this pilfering may procure me some preferment in the Church.

" I once (a) begged and prayed a foreign vagrant (who styled himself Erasmus, bishop of Arcadia) to give me episcopal consecration, that I might be a bishop at large, and have it in my power to ordain my ragged regiment of lay-preachers.

" Notwithstanding, though I gave the man many fair speeches, he would not hearken to my voice.

" But who knows whether in the borrowed (b) plumes of Dr. Johnson I may not perchance obtain a pension, if not slip into an English cathedral ; or (at least) be appointed to the first American bishoprick ?

" Alas ! alas ! a sudden thrill goes through me, and my cogitations are perplexed within me ! for before I can be made a (c) bishop my infamous plagiarism may be found out.

On this fable, Dr. Croxall very properly remarks, that for a man " to be barely pleased with appearing above what he really is, may justly render him contemptible in the eyes of his equals. But if, to enable him to do this with a better grace, he has feathered his nest with his neighbour's goods, he hath nothing to expect, when found out, but to be stripped of his plunder, and used like a ——— into the bargain."

(c) In the Address to the Colonies, Mr. Wesley expresses himself thus : " I gain nothing, either by the

"However, worst come to worst, what if it be? It is not the first time that my old foxship has been started, and my impositions have been detected.

"Many writers have lustily plundered the works of other men: but I am resolved to out-plunder, and to out-blunder, them all."

SECTION II.

AND it came to pass while the priest thus communed with his own heart, that a very aged man in black clothing rendered himself visible, and said:

"Fear not, my son, to do the thing which thy soul lusteth after:

"For much riches and renown and comfort shall it add unto thee.

"Nothing venture, nothing have. Snatch the precious moment. Distil the doctor's pamphlet. And when thou hast extracted the substance thereof, cork it up for sale in twopenny phials.

"Yet a little while, and revolving winds will waft the doctor back to his native shore.

"Imitate, therefore, certain worthy sons of mine (vulgarily called housebreakers), who are never better pleased than with committing an unmolested burglary, when a family is from home."

And therewith the black veteran gave the priest a tweak by the elbow; who, shaking his locks, and taking his quill in hand, entered immediately on this business of distillation.

How faithfully, how dexterously, how judiciously, and how (d) plentifully he executed the task, will appear from the following Synopsis: wherein the very words of Dr. Johnson are given on one side; and the very words of the foundry priest on the other.

DR. JOHNSON.

1. "An English colony is a number of persons, to whom the king grants a charter, permitting them to settle in some distant country."

[Tax. no Tyr. p. 25.]
2. "And enabling them to constitute a corporation, enjoying such powers as the charter grants, to be administered in such forms as the charter prescribes." Ibid.

MR. WESLEY.

1. "An English colony is a number of persons, to whom the king grants a charter, permitting them to settle in some far country."

[Ad. to the Am. Col. P. 3.]
2. "As a corporation enjoying such powers as the charter grants, to be administered in such a manner as the charter prescribes." P. 4.

Government, or by the Americans; and probably never shall." P. 12. Is not this something like hanging out a sign-post to invite custom? or, si mavis, putting up a bill importing, lodgings to let? or, setting himself up to auction, saying, "The party, whether Ministerial or American, that bids most for me, shall have me?" At least, is there not, in the above declaration, a loop-hole of reserve? a back door to creep out at?—Not to notice that, in affirming he "gains nothing by the Government," he is very ungrateful, and advances a known untruth. He "gains" protection at least, and toleration, from "Government," and instead of calling this much, has he the face to call it "Nothing?" I should be glad to know, what his gratitude would term something?—Moreover, time was, when Mr. Wesley gained, even from American bounty and

DR. JOHNSON.

3. "As a corporation, they make laws for themselves: but as a corporation subsisting by a grant from a higher authority, to the controul of that authority they continue subject." P. 25.

4. "The Parliament of England has a right to bind them (the Americans) by statutes,—and has therefore a legal and constitutional power of laying upon them any tax or impost,—for the defence of America, for the purpose of raising a revenue, or for any other end beneficial to the empire." P. 30.

5. "It is, say the American advocates, the natural distinction of a freeman, and the legal distinction of an Englishman,—that nothing can be taken from him, but by his own consent. This consent is given, for every man, by his representative in parliament." P. 31.

6. "Whatever is true of taxation, is true of every other law." P. 32.

7. "He that denies the English parliament the right of taxation, denies it likewise the right of making any other laws, civil or criminal. Yet this power over the colonies was never yet disputed by themselves. They have always admitted statutes for the punishment of offences, and for the redress or prevention of inconveniencies." P. 32, 33.

8. "The reception of any law draws after it, by a chain which cannot be broken, the necessity of submitting to taxation." P. 33.

9. "That a freeman is governed by himself, or by laws to which he has consented,—every man—feels it to be false." Ibid.

10. "In wide-extended dominions,—a very small part of the people are either primarily or secondarily consulted in legislation." Ibid.

11. "The business of

MR. WESLEY.

3. "As a corporation, they make laws for themselves; but, as a corporation subsisting by a grant from a higher authority, to the controul of that authority they still continue subject." P. 4.

4. "The supreme power in England has a legal right of laying any tax upon them, for any end beneficial to the whole empire." Ibid.

5. "But you object, It is the privilege of a freeman and an Englishman to be taxed, only by his own consent. And this consent is given for every man by his representative in parliament." Ibid.

6. "Whatever holds with regard to taxation, holds with regard to all other laws." P. 5.

7. "He who denies the English parliament the power of taxation, denies it the right of making any laws at all. But this power over the colonies you have never disputed. You have always admitted statutes, for the punishment of offences, and for the preventing or redressing of inconveniencies." Ibid.

8. "The reception of any law draws after it, by a chain which cannot be broken, the necessity of admitting taxation." Ibid.

9. "That every freeman is governed by laws to which he has consented,—is absolutely false." Ibid.

10. "In wide extended dominions, a very small part of the people are concerned in making laws." Ibid.

11. "All public busicivily. Has he forgot his residence at Savanna, and some certain incidents therewith connected?

(d) It may be alleged, that in Mr. Wesley's plentiful cribbings and carvings from Doctor Johnson, he had rather borrowed than stolen the Doctor's paragraphs. To which I answer: that if he has borrowed them, he is one of those, concerning whom David observes, the ungodly boroweth, and payeth not again. For Mr. Wesley is so far from acknowledging himself a debtor to Dr. Johnson, that he never, so much as once, from the beginning of his two-penny Tract to the end, mentioned the Doctor's name, or made any reference to the Doctor's pamphlet; though that pamphlet is the hole of the pit from which Mr. Wesley has dug and fetched up his own.

Dr. JOHNSON.
the public must be done by delegation. The choice of delegates is made by a select number. And those who are not electors, stand idle and helpless spectators." P. 43, 44.

12. "Of electors, the hap is but little better. — Where the numbers approach to equality, almost half must be governed, not only without, but against their choice." P. 34.

13. "How any man can have consented to institutions established in distant ages, it will be difficult to explain. The consent of individual's is merely passive—As all are born the subjects of some state or other, we may be said to have been all born consenting to some system of government. Other consent than this, the condition of civil life does not allow." Ibid.

14. "The Americans are telling one another, — that they are entitled to life, liberty, and property; and that they have never ceded to any sovereign power whatever, a right to dispose of either, with out their consent." P. 35.

15. "While they speak as the naked sons of nature, they claim but what is claimed by other men." Ibid.

16. "Their next resolution declares, that their ancestors, who first settled the colonies, were, at the time of their emigration from the mother country, entitled to all the rights, liberties, and immunities of free and natural-born subjects within the realm of England. This likewise is true." P. 36.

17. "But, when this is granted, their boast of original rights is at an end. They are no longer in a state of nature. — These lords of themselves — these demi-gods of independence, sink down to colonists, governed by a charter." Ibid.

18. "If their ancestors were subjects, they acknowledged a sovereign. If they had a right to English privileges, they were accountable to English laws; and — had ceded to the king and parliament — the power of disposing, without their consent, of their lives, liberties, and properties." P. 37.

19. "It is required of them to prove, that the parliament ever ceded to them a dispensation from that obedience which they owe as natural born sub-

Mr. WESLEY.
ness must be done by delegation. The delegates are chosen by a select number. And those that are not electors, — stand by idle and helpless spectators." P. 5, 6.

12. "The case of electors themselves is little better. When they are near equally divided, almost half of them must be governed, not only without, but even against, their own consent." P. 6.

13. "How has any man consented to those laws which were made before he was born? Our consent to these — is purely passive. And, in every place, as all men are born the subjects of some state or other, so they are born passively, as it were, consenting to the laws of that state. Other than this kind of consent, the condition of civil life does not allow." Ibid.

14. "But say, you are entitled to life, liberty and property, by nature; and that you have never ceded to any sovereign power, the right to dispose of these, without your consent." Ibid.

15. "While you speak as the naked sons of nature, this is certainly true." P. 7.

16. "But you presently declare, our ancestors, at the time they settled these colonies, were entitled to all the rights of natural born subjects, within the realm of England. This likewise is true." Ibid.

17. "But, when this is granted, the boast of original rights is at an end. You are no longer in a state of nature, but sink down to colonists governed by a charter." Ibid.

18. "If your ancestors were subjects, they acknowledged a sovereign. If they had a right to English privileges, they were accountable to English laws; and had ceded to the king and parliament the power of disposing, without their consent, of both their lives, liberties, and properties." Ibid.

19. "Did the parliament cede to them a dispensation from the obedience which they owe as natural subjects? or any degree of independence,

Dr. JOHNSON.
jects; or any degree of independence and immu nity not enjoyed by other Englishmen?" P. 37.

20. "They say, that, by such emigration, they by no means forfeited any of those rights; that they were, and their descendants now are, entitled to the exercise and enjoyment of all such of them as their local and other circumstances enable them to exercise and enjoy." Ibid.

21. "That they who form a settlement by a lawful charter, having committed no crime, forfeit no privileges; will be readily confessed. But what they do not forfeit by any judicial sentence, they may lose by natural effects." P. 38.

22. "He, who goes voluntarily to America, cannot complain of losing what he leaves in Europe. He, perhaps, had a right to vote for a knight or burgess. By crossing the Atlantic, he has (e) not nullified his right; for he has made its exertion no longer possible. He has reduced himself, from a voter, to one of the innumerable multitude that have no vote." Ibid.

23. "As the English colonists are not represented in the British parliament, they are entitled to a free power of legislation. They inherit, they say, from their ancestors, the right which their ancestors professed, of enjoying all the privileges of Englishmen. That they inherit the right of their ancestors, is allowed; but they can inherit no more." P. 39, 40.

24. "Their ancestors left a country, where the representatives of the people were elected by men particularly qualified, and where those, who wanted qualifications, or who did not use them, were bound by the decisions of men whom they had not deputed." P. 40, 41.

25. "The colonists are the descendants of men who either had no votes in elections; or who voluntarily resigned them, for something in their opinion of more estimation. They have, therefore, exactly what their ancestors left them; not a vote in making laws, or in constituting legislators; but the happiness of being protected by law, and the duty of obeying it." P. 41.

26. "What their ancestors did not carry with them, neither they nor

Mr. WESLEY.
not enjoyed by other Englishmen." P. 7.

20. "They did not, indeed, as you observe, by emigration, forfeit any of those privileges; but they were, and their descendants now are, entitled to all such as their circumstances enable them to enjoy." P. 7, 8.

21. "That they who form a colony by a lawful charter, forfeit no privileges thereby, is certain. But what they do not forfeit by any judicial sentence, they may lose by natural effects." P. 8.

22. "When a man voluntarily comes into America, he may lose what he had in Europe. Perhaps he had a right to vote for a knight or burgess. By crossing the sea, he did not forfeit this right; but it is plain he has made the exercise of it no longer possible. He has reduced himself, from a voter, to one of the innumerable multitude that have no votes." Ibid.

23. "As the colonies are not represented in the British parliament, they are entitled to a free power of legislation. For they inherit all the right which their ancestors had, of enjoying all the privileges of Englishmen — They do inherit all the privileges which their ancestors had; but they can inherit no more." Ibid.

24. "Their ancestors left a country, where the representatives of the people were elected by men particularly qualified, and where those, who wanted that qualification, were bound by the decisions of men whom they had not deputed." P. 8, 9.

25. "You are the descendants of men, who either had no votes, or resigned them by emigration. You have therefore exactly what your ancestors left you; not a vote in making laws; nor in choosing legislators; but the happiness of being protected by laws, and the duty of obeying them." P. 9.

26. "What your ancestors did not bring with them, neither they nor

(e) The word not here seems to have crept in, through a mistake of the printer. The drift of the doctor's arguing is, to prove, that emigration does nullify those rights which the emigrant previously enjoyed in his own country. Mr. Wesley, however swallows the pamphlet by wholesale, errors and all, rough and smooth, as it runs; just as a man takes his wife for better for worse.

DR. JOHNSON.—their descendants have since acquired. They have not, by abandoning their part in one legislature, obtained the power of constituting another: any more than the multitudes, who are now debarred from voting, have a right to erect a separate parliament for themselves." P. 41, 42.

27. "His majesty's colonies are entitled to all the privileges and immunities granted and confirmed to them by royal charters, or secured to them by their several codes of provincial laws. The first clause will be readily admitted. To all the privileges which a charter can convey, they are by a royal charter evidently entitled. The second clause is of greater difficulty." P. 42, 43.

28. "Provincial laws may grant to certain individuals of the province, the enjoyment of gainful, or an immunity from onerous offices. But no province can confer provincial privileges on itself." P. 43.

29. "They may have a right to all which the king has given them; but it is a conceit of the other hemisphere, that men have a right to all which they have given to themselves." Ibid.

30. "A corporation can no more extend its own immunities than a man can, by his own choice, assume dignities or titles." Ibid.

31. "The legislature of a colony is only the vestry of a larger parish, which may lay a cess on the inhabitants, but must modify its particular regulations by the general law; and, whatever may be its internal expenses, is still liable to taxes laid by superior authority." P. 44.

MR. WESLEY.—their descendants have acquired. They have not, by abandoning their right in one legislature, acquired a right to constitute another, any more than the multitudes in England, who have no vote, have a right to erect a parliament for themselves." P. 9.

27. "However, the colonies have a right to all the privileges granted them by royal charters, or secured to them by provincial laws. The first clause is allowed: they have certainly a right to all the privileges granted them by the royal charters. But as to the second, there is a doubt." P. 9, 10.

28. "Provincial laws may grant privileges to individuals of the province; but, surely, no province can confer provincial privileges on itself." P. 10.

29. "They have a right to all which the king has given them; but not to all which they have given themselves." Ibid.

30. "A corporation can no more assume to itself privileges which it had not before, than a man can, by his own act and deed, assume titles or dignities." Ibid.

31. "The legislature of a colony may be compared to the vestry of a large parish, which may lay a cess on its inhabitants, but still regulated by the law; and, whatever be its internal expenses, is still liable to taxes laid by superior authority." Ibid.

of a leech, because the latter may have thought fit to pay its compliments to the veins of the former.

SECTION III.

It is not the intention of this tract to canvass the merits of Dr. Johnson's reasoning; but merely to shew that the best part of what Mr. Wesley most impudently and most truly calls his own Address to the Americans; is, both as to matter and expression, a bundle of Lilliputian shafts, picked and stolen out of Dr. Johnson's pin-cushion.

If Mr. Wesley had the least spark of shame remaining, the simple detection of such enormous literary theft would be more terrible to his feelings than an English pumping, or an American tarring and feathering.

I can say in earnest what this unblushing priest lately declared concerning himself, viz. "I am no politician; politics lie quite out of my province (f)." It is not for me to enter deeply, much less with acrimony, into those public contests which now carry so formidable an aspect on the best interests of the English empire. My department and inclination lead me ardently to pray, in humble and pacific obscurity, for the safety and prosperity of my nation, church, and king. But the interested, the inconsistent, the shameless conduct of Mr. Wesley compels me to put the two following queries to his conscience, if any thing like conscience has fallen to his share.

I. Did you not, within this twelvemonth, openly declare in the pulpit, at Bristol, that in your opinion, and to use your own canting words, "America is the favourite land of the Lord?" Adding, "Woe be to that man, either in England or out of it, that dares to lift up a finger against America!" I only ask, how does this (be it right or wrong) comport with the tenor of that sound which you now echo from Dr. Johnson's drum?

II. Did you not, in the year 1770, thus express yourself (whether justly or improperly I have no design to enquire)? "I do not defend the measures which have been taken with regard to America. I doubt whether any man can defend them either on the foot of law, equity, or prudence." (g) Probably the weathercock is not even yet completely rusted. It may still vary with the wind. To what point of the compass will it veer next? Certainly not to a new one, for it has again and again turned to all the thirty-two. Go on, sir, to prove all things: but be sure that you do not forfeit your charter and sully the glory of your past eccentricities by holding fast any thing that is good. Keep up to your old character:

"Stiff in opinion, mostly in the wrong,
Be every thing by starts, and nothing long."

(f) Wesley's Free Thoughts on the State of Public Affairs, p. 3; printed in 1770. This gentleman lamented (Ibid. p. 4.) that "every collier, tinker, porter, and hackney-coachman," can dabble in politics. And yet the lamenter himself actually employs coblers &c., to preach what he calls the gospel.

(g) These are Mr. Wesley's very words, in his Free Thoughts on the State, &c. p. 14.

The fly is now perched with much solemnity on Dr. Johnson's wheel. But who can tell what a moment may bring forth? The quondam (h) admirer of Junius may possibly, in the twinkling of an eye, commence the panegyrist of an English Cromwell, or of a Scotch Macbeth.

This is the Mr. Wesley who not long ago had the modesty to tell the world that his principles have been the same "for eight and twenty years." Instead of principles in the plural, he should have said principle in the singular. For I grant there is a principle by which he has uniformly abode; viz. to change and shift about like the minute-hand of a clock. Nor does he bid fair ever to stand at a point till all the vital weights are quite run down and the pendulum ceases to play.

Little more than two centuries ago a famous temporising priest who had turned with every tide; who was a half Protestant in the close of Henry VIII.'s reign, a whole Protestant in the reign of Edward VI., a good Catholic in the reign of Mary, and a Protestant again in the reign of Elizabeth; returned the following answer to a friend who charged him with religious and political unsteadiness, and with having either no conscience at all, or at least a very convenient conscience, made of stretching and dilating, as whim or interest might require.

"You are much mistaken," said the pious divine: "I am by no means that changeable person you take me for. No man in the world was ever more steady to his principles, or acted a more consistent part. When I was first presented to the vicarage of Bray, I resolved to hold it as long as I breathed. And I have acted accordingly. Vicar of Bray I was. Vicar of Bray I am. And vicar of Bray I will be to the end of the chapter."

By way of winding up the whole matter, I will take my present leave of Mr. Wesley, with submitting to the reader a very notable specimen of father John's wretched but (in him) not astonishing inconsistency.

"Your ancestors had ceded, to the king and parliament, the power of disposing, without their consent, of both their lives, liberties, and properties." Wesley's Calm Address to the Americans. P. 7.

"No man can dispose of another's life, but by his own consent. I add, no, nor with his consent. For no man has a right to dispose of his own life. Now, it is an indisputable truth, nihil dat quod non habet: none gives what he has not. It plainly follows, that no man can give to another a right which he never had himself, viz. the power of the sword, any such power as implies a right to take away life."

Wesley's Thoughts on the Origin of Power, p. 11. printed A. D. 1772.

How delightfully do those two opposite paragraphs coalesce and hang together!

But what are contradictions to John Wesley? I congratulate administration on their acquisition of so wise, so knowing, so honest, so uniform, so disinterested, so steady, and so respectable a politician. A politician, who in some companies affirms that his sudden approbation of government measures was occasioned by his perusal of Dr. Johnson's 'Taxation no Tyranny:' and without a blush avers in other companies that his said political conversion was brought about by virtue of a long conversation with two members of parliament. Pity it is that great truth-tellers, like great wits, should be so famous for short memories!

LONDON, OCT. 19, 1775

POSTSCRIPT.

Should Dr. Johnson's echo be asked to preach a charity sermon larded with tory politics in Bethnal Green Church; we shall have the title of a good old song realized afresh: and the charity girls may squeak a stanza to the tune of 'The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green.'

PARTICULARS

OF

POPE JOAN.

It has been confidently asserted by some modern members of the Romish communion that the story concerning pope Joan is a mere fiction, invented by Protestants to blacken the infallible Church. In opposition to which insinuation I here insert the following extract copied verbatim by my own hand from that scarce and curious old book entitled The Nuremburgh Chronicle: which was printed at Nuremburgh in the year of our Lord 1493; in a Popish city, by Popish printers, and compiled by Popish hands no less than four and twenty years before the first dawn of the Reformation which Luther afterwards began.

The reader will find the following succinct history of this famous female pope in the above work, p. 169, b.

"Johannes Anglicus (et ut ferunt), ex mogunciaco ortus, malis artibus pontificatum adeptus; mentis enim sexum, cum femina esset. Adolescens acmodum, Athenas cum viro docto amatore proficiscitur: ibique, præceptores bonarum artium audiendo, tantum profecit, ut Romam veniens, paucos admodum etiam in sacris literis pares haberet, nedum superiores. Legendo autem et disputando doctè et acutè, tantum benevolentiae et auctoritatis sibi comparavit, ut, mortuo Leone, in ejus locum (ut Martinus ait), omnium consensu, pontifex crearetur. Verum postea a familiari compressa, cum aliquandiu occulte ventrem tulisset; tandem, cum ad Lateranensem basilicam proficiscretur, intra theatrum (quod Colosseum vo-cant) a Neronis coloso and sanctum Clementem, doloribus circumventa, peperit. Eoque loci mortua, pontificatus sui anno secundo, mense uno, diebus quatuor, sine ullo honore sepelitur. Sunt qui hæc duo scribant: pontificem ipsum quum ad Lateranensum basilicam proficiscitur, detestandi facinoris causa, et viam illam consultò delinare; et ejusdem vitandi erroris causa, dum primò in sede Petri collocatur ad eam rem perforata genitalia ob ultimo diacono obtractari."

(A) See Mr. Wesley's tract, already referred to; viz. Free Thoughts, &c. p. 4.

TRANSLATION OF THE ABOVE.

"John, of English descent, but said to have been born at Mentz, obtained the Popedom by sinister arts: for she palmed herself upon the world as a man, when in reality she was a woman. In her youth she accompanied a learned lover of her's to Athens: and there, by attending the lectures of the best literary professors, she made so great a progress in erudition that, on her arrival in Rome, she had few equals and no superiors in all kinds of theological knowledge. By her learned lectures and by her masterly disputations she acquired so much esteem and authority that, on the death of Leo, she was by universal consent (as Martinus affirms) created pope.

"Some time after her elevation to the pontifical dignity she became criminally familiar with one of her domestics; and pregnancy was the consequence. She took care by every precaution to conceal this circumstance as long as possible: until at last, as she was walking [in public procession] to the Lateran Church [in Rome], she was suddenly seized with labour-pains, and brought forth her infant in that part of the street which lies between the Theatre and the Church of St. Clement. She died on the spot; having held the Popedom two years, one month, and four days.

"Some writers affirm that to this very day, whenever the pope walks in procession to the Lateran Church, he constantly goes thither by another way, to avoid reviving the memory of the above-mentioned detestable event; and that, in order to prevent a similar imposition" [i. e. in order that the infallible Church may not again mistake the sex of her popes], "the new-elected Pontiff is properly examined by the junior deacon, at the time at his holiness's first enthronement in St. Peter's chair; the seat whereof is perforated for that purpose."

Thus far the Nuremburgh Chronicle. To which I add the following indisputable particulars.

1. This said Mrs. Joan (who called herself John VIII.) was successor in the popedom to Leo. IV. who died, A. D. 855, and she herself was succeeded by Benedict III.

2. Not only do many grave Roman Catholic historians assert the fact; but the fact itself has also exercised the wits of more than a few ingenious poets of that communion. Witness the following epigrammatic verse:

Papa pater patrum peperit papissa papellum.

Not to mention those lines of Mantuan, who was himself a Carmelite friar, and who represents pope Joan and her lover hanging in the ante-chamber of hell:

Hic pendebat adhuc sexum mentita virilem,
Fœmina cui triplici Phrygiæ diademate mitram
Suspendebat apex; et pontificalis adulter.

3. The statue of this she-pope remained in the cathedral church of Sienna so low down as until about the year 1677: when it was demolished, in order to stifle all memory of an incident so disastrous and dishonourable to the holy see.

The reader should be apprized, that a wooden print representing the said lady and her child was inserted originally and still remains in the Nuremburgh Chronicle above-mentioned.

Was not at least this pope the whore of Babylon?

CONTEMPLATION ON SNOW.

"Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?"
JOB xxxv. iii. 22.

THE whole world of nature, no less than those of grace and of glory, is under the absolute dominion and the never ceasing direction of God. Every wind that blows is of his breathing; and every drop, whether fluid or condensed, that falls from the sky, is of his sending. At this very time must the adoring nations confess that he giveth snow like wool; and he scattereth the hoar frost like ashes; he casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand against his cold? Psalm cxlvii. 16. 17.—He saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength. Job xxxvii. 6.

Let the same question be put to my readers which speaking Omnipotence once put to Job (chap. xxxviii. 22). "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?" Hast thou considered its nature, its properties, and its uses?

Dew, mist, rain, snow, hail, and clouds are no more than coalitions of watery vapours which have been partly forced towards the surface of our terraqueous globe by the latent fires with which its bowels are fraught; and partly drawn up from it by the insinuating, attractive agency of the sun. The humid particles thus exhaled naturally ascend; as being in their uncombined state lighter than the surrounding air: and persist to soar, until they arrive at a region of the atmosphere where their flight is stopped by other preceding vapours already exhaled and condensed into clouds. Thus arrested and detained, they unite (like coalescing spherules of quicksilver, or like the contacting globules of water in a containing vessel) into floating masses; and remain in a state of literal suspense and fluctuation until, by accumulated compression, and by their own collected weight, they become specifically heavier than the sustaining air, and fall in larger or smaller drops to the earth and ocean whence they sprung.—Striking representation of man in his best estate of moral excellence! Are you rich, or exalted, or prosperous, or gay? remember, that you are under an absolute obligation to Providence for these glittering distinctions, as a rising vapour is indebted for its transitory elevation to the action of the solar beams. And, vapour-like, you too must fall, after having hovered your few destined moments: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. An inspired pen has both started and resolved the question: What is your life? It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. James iv. 14. If so, “Why all this toil for triumphs of an hour?

What though we wade in wealth or soar in fame?
Earth’s highest glory ends in, ‘Here he lies!’
And ‘dust to dust,’ concludes her noblest song.”

Be wise, therefore, to slip the cable of your affections from the world’s evanid shore. Supplicate the Holy Spirit to make you rich towards God. And under the sweet breezes of his gracious influence, set sail in good earnest for the kingdom of heaven.

When the watery treasures of the sky descend to their native earth, more like respectful visitants than like rude invaders, i. e. in moderate quantities, and with not too impetuous force, we call them showers. When they greatly exceed in those two particulars we give them the hostile name of storms.—Thus the human passions, if rectified and regulated by supernatural grace, are instruments of happiness, and productive of the most beneficial effects. But if unrestrained by Providence, and unrefined by the Holy Ghost, they operate like the deadly Egyptian tempest, which smote both man and beast, and destroyed every herb, and brake all the trees of the field. Exod. ix. 25.

While the middle regions of the air are impregnated with frost, the falling drops catch cold (if the expression may be allowed), and are congealed in the course of their descent. Hail and snow are but other names for different modifications of frozen rain. Hail is rain consolidated into a hard and heavy mass. Snow is a multitude of small hooked icicles which, interfering with each other in their fall, become mutually entangled and interlinked: and cohere in delicate, but irregular, flakes of very light, because of very expansive and superficial, texture.—If snow is no more than particles of water, congealed in their passage to the earth, it affords but too just an emblem of our affections when, instead of aspiring to God in Christ, they subside and gravitate towards a perishable world. Under such spiritual declension, our comforts are chilled, and our graces benumbed: until a fresh rising of the sun of righteousness upon our souls dissolves the moral frost, and again warms us into the meltings of penitential love. His beams strike upon the rock, and then the waters flow.

REFLECTIONS

ON A

THUNDER STORM.

WHEN the lightning flashes, and when the thunder rolls, do we as it were hear the Almighty speak in the one and see a glimpse of his tremendous glory in the other! If when the clouds pour out water, when the air thunders, and the arrows of his lightning are sent abroad, it is natural for the guilty to tremble, for the just to pray, and for all to look up to him whose voice is thus mighty in operation; where will the ungodly, where will the unbeliever, where will the habitual sinner appear, when the Lord himself descends from heaven with a shout, a shout that shall unbar the gates of death, recal the scattered dust of all mankind, and wake that dust to life?

May we ever listen to the Almighty when he speaks in thunder, or looks in lightning, and call to mind that awful period when the final trump shall summon us to the bar! may every such season be improved to this beneficial purpose! And though thunder and other effects are under God, owing to natural causes and may be accounted for on natural principles; yet let us remember that natural causes are caused by the God of nature, and that the effects which they produce are in truth the effects of his all-active, all-governing providence. And this is the glorious God that maketh the thunder. Such a view of things will render the most obvious events lessons of the highest instruction, and means of spiritual improvement. Thus considered, thunder teaches, and lightning holds the lamp to knowledge: nature becomes subservient to grace, and the laws of the material system direct to heaven. And should we not aspire to the friendship of that Being whose voice shakes the earth, and whose eyes are as a flame of fire? Should we not approach his footstool, humbled in the dust of repentance, and trusting in the propitiation of him who hushed the infinitely more dreadful thunder of divine resentment, and, in his own blood, quenched the lightning of vindictive wrath? Possessed of interest in his availing merit, and conformed, as far as human infirmity will permit, to his blessed example, we need fear nothing. Though the earth was removed, and the hills carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof should rage and swell, and the mountains shake at the tempest of the same; yet safely anchored on the rock of redeeming merit, and lodged in the arms of God's everlasting love, we should be equally free both from danger and from dread. Let the inferior thunders grate upon the ear; let sublunary lightnings flash terror on the eye,* so we are enabled to take shelter beneath the hiding place of a Redeemer's righteousness, and his spirit, in gentlest accents, whispers comfort to the heart. Happy they who thus dwell beneath the defence of the Most High, who abide under the shadow of the Almighty, and to whom his faithfulness and truth are a shield and buckler!

—————
THOUGHTS
ON
PERSEVERANCE.

MANY of God's dear people are frequently afraid that, on account of their own weakness and the power of their spiritual enemies, they shall at length make shipwreck of faith, and totally fall away. Yet perhaps none stand more sure and safe than those who think they cannot stand at all: for "Happy is the man who feareth always," Prov. xxviii. 14. Happy the soul that is possessed of that holy fear which drives him to the Lord, keeps him vile in his own eyes, and causeth him to be ever dependent upon the word and promise of a faithful God, and makes him rejoice with trembling, and tremble with hope.

But we are assured from the oracles of unerring truth, "that the righteous should hold on his way; and he that hath clean hands," he (whose actions are pure in consequence of his heart being purified by faith) "shall be stronger and stronger," Job xvii. 9. As this doctrine is a source of comfort and support to the children of God, I shall humbly offer some arguments to prove it, which have been matter of serious meditation, and, I trust, of consolation to my own mind.

I. The economy of the covenant of grace.—The covenant is said to be "ordered in all things, and sure," 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. This the holy Psalmist triumphed in, even in the prospect of death; this enabled him to look the king of terrors in the face with composure and serenity; this emboldened him to play on the hole of the asp, and to put his hand on the cockatrice den, Isa. xi. 8. Feeling his mortal powers decay, he rejoiced in the approaching prospect of that glory to which by virtue of this well ordered covenant he possessed a valid and alienable right.

All believers have one and the same title to glory; all are equally interested in the blessings of the covenant; and it being sure, it follows that none of those whom God deals with, in a covenant way, can finally perish, or it could not be termed well-ordered, or sure. The apostle calls it "a better covenant," Heb. viii. 6. better than that made with Adam. Our first parents were capacitated to stand and continue in obedience to their Sovereign; but, being mutable, they fell, no grace being promised to secure their standing. But believers stand and are upheld by the veracity and immutability of God that cannot lie. The covenant of grace, then, is a better covenant, and established upon better promises, which assure the people of God of grace to help in every time of need. It will, methinks, be hard to prove how it can be called a better covenant, if those that are in it may (as some suppose) fall away.

II. The death of Christ is another argument to prove this point. Christ is the head of his church under the covenant of grace, as Adam was of all mankind under the covenant of works; as such he graciously undertook for all his people, and by his active and passive obedience, he fully satisfied the law and justice of God on their behalf, and opened a new and living way for their return to God here by faith, hereafter by sweet and blessed fruition. Nor did he die for all; for there were some when he died suffering in their own persons the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude, ver. 7. It would be blasphemy to say he died for those who were then in torment: this is the natural product of Arminianism. We allow the Scripture says, "he tasted death for every man." Hebrews ii. 9. υπερ παντος cannot signify for all, but for every one. If we attend to the apostle's strain of meaning, it is evident he speaks of many sons being brought unto glory. Christ is not ashamed to call them his brethren. "Forasmuch, then, as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that by death he might destroy death," &c. Those he represented in his obedience unto death, are his brethren, the members of his body mystical, and he tasted death for every one of them. Hence we are warranted to conclude every one of his brethren or people shall be saved. To say, all may be saved, is in effect to affirm that none shall: a thing that only may be, may surely not be; and if there is but a peradventure for our salvation, it is easy to prove no soul ever can be saved. Our Saviour says, "All that the Father hath given me, shall come to me; and him that cometh, I will in no wise cast out, but will raise him up at the last day." John vi. 37—44. In which words is contained, 1. the doctrine of election; 2. of faith: 3. of glory.

fiction, in order to which, perseverance is absolutely necessary, and must be implied.

When we consider Christ to be God, he must know for whom he suffered; and if we also consider the greatness, merits and efficacy of his sufferings, he could not undergo all in vain: but it would (with reverence I speak it) be in vain, if those he died for were finally to miscarry.

III. The work of the Spirit.—When the Spirit begins, he carries on his work in the hearts of his people till they are made meet for the inheritance prepared for them above; for he has engaged in covenant to bow the wills, to regulate the powers, and sanctify the affections of all the elect; to lead, guide, strengthen, and direct them through this wilderness; and he never leaves the subjects of his grace till he puts them into the arms of the Redeemer in glory. To this purpose Christ speaks, John iv. 14. "Who-soever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst. But the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up (αλλομενς, bubbling, and still ascending with energy and constancy, till it bubble up) into everlasting life." Pertinent to this point also, is what the apostle says, "He that establishes us with you, and hath anointed us, is God, who hath sealed us, and given us the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts, 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. Those that are established and anointed, and have the sealing and earnest of the Spirit, cannot fall away. This is again mentioned in Ephes. i. 13, 14.

IV. We may argue from God's faithfulness and immutability. That immutability is an essential attribute of God, the Scriptures abundantly assert. Mal. iii. 6. Worthy our attention is what an excellent author says upon the unchangeableness of God: "Could he ever be changed, it must be by others, or himself; by others it cannot be, not being in the power of any; how can the thing made have power over him that made it? Nor by himself: if so, it must be for the better or the worse: for the worse it cannot be, for then he must cease to be the most perfect being, or cease to be God: nor for the better; for how can he be better who is already absolutely the best?" Jenks's Medit. vol. ii. 2nd edit., p. 29.

God having bestowed his grace upon his people, he never takes it from them: his unchangeableness will not admit of it: "The gifts and callings of God are without repentance." Rom. xi. 19. "If when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." Rom. v. 10. If when we were strangers and enemies to God, and the way of salvation revealed in the gospel, his grace reached us and proved victorious in subjecting us to his will; much more, being made willing to love, follow, and obey him, we shall be saved and preserved to his kingdom of glory. Saving grace is the free gift of God; and he gave it to remain and abide for ever, Eccl. iii. 14. This is his gracious promise in Isaiah liv. 8—10. "With everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer. The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee," &c. So says Christ, John x. 28, speaking of his sheep, "they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hands." And the apostle speaks of some who are kept by the power of God (kept as in a garrison), through faith unto salvation, 1 Pet. i. 5. Whence is that of an ancient father: Horum (videl. electorum) si quispiam perit humano vitio vincitur Deus: sed nemo eorum perit quia nullā re vincitur Deus: "If any of the elect perish, God is overcome by man's perverseness; but none of them perish, because God, who is omnipotent, can by no means be overcome." August. de Corrupt. et Grat. cap. vii. The saints therefore shall be brought off more than conquerors; for God hath said, "I will never, never leave thee: no, no, I will never forsake thee," (for thus that precious promise should be rendered) Heb. xiii. 5. Add to this,

V. The testimony of God's people in all ages of the Church. Look at the generations of old, and see, did any ever trust in God and was confounded? or "when were the righteous cast off?" "The Lord will not cast off his people." Ps. xciv. 14. Lam. iii. 31. To this truth they are now enabled at times to bear their joint testimony. Bucer, a little before his death, spoke thus to Bradford: Castiget fortiter adjiciet autem nunquam, nunquam ahjiciet: which exactly corresponds with the Psalmist, Ps. lxxiii. 26. "My heart and my flesh faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever!" How triumphant is the apostle's strain, Rom. viii. 38, 39. We read of Baxter (who, though heterodox in many things, was a partaker of the one thing needful), that when asked by a friend when he lay on his death-bed how he was, he replied, "almost well," which a person in the view of opening eternity could never say, unless he found God very precious and found him faithful. Whatever dross this holy man carried about him in his life, it was consumed in his death, and he received into glory. The testimony of glorified spirits above, as it bears weight in it, so it corroborates this truth. Their song is, "Faithful and true," Rev. xix. 11. This is proved likewise,

VI. And lastly, from the intercession of Christ. "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," says our Saviour to Peter, Luke xxii. 32, and we know his prayer was heard; though his faith failed as to the exercise of it, yet the root and habit of it remained, and accordingly sprung forth, revived, and grew so strong, that Peter afterwards was emboldened to suffer and to die for his Lord.

Our Lord began the prayer upon earth which he now offers in heaven for his people: "Keep through thy own name those whom thou hast given me," John xvii. 11. 24. He prays (or rather demands, as the purchase of his death) saying, "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am;" on which ground we may conclude that all Christ died for shall possess that crown of glory that fadeth not away, it being impossible that Jesus should intercede in vain. This is the foundation of the apostle's challenge, "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who also maketh intercession for us," Rom. viii. 34. May all God's people, who have their faces Zion-ward, take encouragement from these things to go forward in the name and strength of the God of their salvation, till they arrive in the mansions of bliss and endless felicity.

A

COURSE OF FAMILY PRAYER, FOR EACH DAY IN THE WEEK.

Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I, in the midst of them. Matt. xviii. 20.
Praying in the Holy Ghost. Jude 20.

And the smoke of the incense, which came up with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God, out of the angel's hand. Rev. viii. 4.

SUNDAY MORNING.

[Collect, before reading the appointed portion of Scripture.]

THROUGH the riches of thy mercy, and by the power of thy sustaining goodness, we are brought in safety to see the light of another day, even the light of a new Lord's day, the best of days, the type of that glorious rest which remaineth for the people of God. Lord send forth and send down thy Holy Spirit into our hearts; and make thy sabbath a sabbath-day indeed to each of our souls; a day of spiritual improvement, heavenly consolation and near communion with thee: O satisfy us with thy mercy, and that right soon; so shall we rejoice and be glad all the days of our lives. Lift up the light of thy countenance upon us at this time; bless to us all the means of grace, whether public or private, in the use of which we wait for thy salvation: O let them not be as wells without water; but make them channels of divine influence, and effectual to the end for which thou hast appointed them. We desire to begin the Lord's day with the Lord, and to hallow it by the word of God and by prayer. Enable us, O thou Father of mercies, to keep it holy unto thee, and to enjoy saving communion with thee, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

(Here let the family rise from their supplicating posture, and, all being seated, let a select portion of Holy Scripture be read; which ended, a hymn or psalm may be sung; after which the master of the family may conclude as follows, either standing or kneeling.) Let us pray.

Our Father, which art in heaven; hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil: for thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

We thank thee, gracious God, for the return of the morning light, and for causing the day-spring to know its time and place. O may the day-star from on high visit our benighted souls; and may that Saviour who is the bright and morning star, arise and shine within us with healing in his wings: glory be to thy goodness, that the light we see is the Lord's; that this is the day which thou hast made for thyself, and set apart for thy name. May this sabbath-day be a high day to our souls; a day of spiritual feasting and heavenly joy; bring us, O blessed Spirit, into thy banqueting house, and let thy banner over us be love. Blessed be thy name, that we see so many of the days of the son of man; that we enjoy so many precious opportunities of worshipping thee in the beauty of holiness, and of paying our vows unto thee publicly, in the presence of thy people. May we be in the Spirit on the Lord's day; and call the sabbath a delight, holy of the Lord, and honourable. May we cease from our own works, as God on the seventh day ceased from his; and abound only in the work of the Lord. Especially make it to us a sabbath of rest from sin, and a sabbath of rest in God. We are indeed utterly unworthy of the honour, and unable for the work of a fellowship, with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ; but we come unto thee, O blessed Lamb of God, in thy own adorable name, who alone art worthy; and depend on the strength and supply of thy good Spirit, to work all our works in us, and to ordain peace for us. Bless all thy ministering servants throughout the whole world; may they obtain mercy of the Lord to be faithful; faithful to thee, faithful to truth, and faithful to the souls entrusted to their care. Particularly vouchsafe to be with all those who are this day to stand up in thy name, and preach the gospel of thy grace. May they be mighty through thee to convince the unconvinced, to convert the unconverted, to heal them that are of a contrite heart, and to build up believers on their most holy faith. Enable them to preach thy truths with power, and with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; thou thyself graciously working with them, and confirming the work with signs following. Be in the midst of all thy worshipping people, who shall assemble in thy name to-day. Have mercy on those who shall be unwillingly detained from thy house, by sickness or any other providential impediment; comfort them in secret, sanctify their absence by granting them much of thy inward presence. Let them that tarry at home divide the spoil; and as they are excluded from the stream, give them to drink the deeper at the fountain head. Lord assist us, thy unworthy servants, in the religious services of this day. Make us joyful in the house of prayer; when we wait upon thee for a renewal of our strength, may we find our strength indeed renewed; may we inwardly experience the grace of the means, while we attend on the means of grace; and enjoy a saving intercourse with the God of ordinance, in frequenting the ordinances of God. Vouchsafe to take us and ours into thy gracious protection. Bless and preserve us in our going out and coming in. Support and strengthen, direct and guard us; pardon our innumerable sins, the depravity of our nature, and the offences of our lives; and sanctify us to thyself a peculiar people, zealous of good works, and seal us thine in body, soul and spirit, to the day of the Lord Jesus. This day, gracious Lord, keep us in thy fear: let us not find our own pleasure, nor do our own ways, nor speak our own words; but live entirely to thee, converse with thee, know more of thee, and grow up into a greater fitness for thy kingdom and glory. All we beg, O gracious Father, is for thy mercy's sake in Jesus Christ our Saviour: for whom we bless thee, and to whom, with thyself and the Holy Ghost, we desire to ascribe all might, majesty and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

The Lord bless us and keep us; the Lord make his face to shine upon us, and be gracious to us, and give us peace, this day and evermore. Amen.

SUNDAY EVENING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

RECEIVE us graciously, O thou God of all mercy, though we be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary: we trust we can say, that our whole dependence is fixed on him, on that ever blessed Mediator, between God and men, in whom thou hast declared thyself well pleased. Vouchsafe to clothe us with his righteousness, and to sprinkle both our hearts and our performances with his precious blood, which speaketh better things than that of Abel. Smile upon us, and be gracious to us, in this our private audience; may our petitions be received with favour at the throne of grace, and may an answer of peace be sealed in our hearts. In this, and all other doings may we be enabled to look unto thee for a blessing, and to receive the blessing at thy hand, through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

[After reading and singing, add]

Our Father, &c.

O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come. Thou art the Lord, by whom we escape death, and enjoy all things pertaining to life and godliness. Thine we are, and thee we ought to serve. Thou hast holden us up ever since we were born: may our praise be always of thee. We thank thee for thy care over us, and thy favour toward us this day, both in a way of providence and in a way of grace. Less than the least of all thy mercies, we are continually favoured with the greatest: we who deserve justly to be forsaken of thee, and to be cast out of the sight of thine eyes, are yet spared hitherto to be monuments of thy goodness, and of the love that passeth knowledge. Dearest Father, impress our hearts with a lively and lasting sense of what thou hast done for us; and do thou crown all, by working in us that which is well-pleasing in thy sight. Give us unfeignedly repentance toward God, and saving faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Sprinkle us with his precious blood, from all the guilt of our sins, both original and actual; clothe us with his righteousness unto justification; and grant us that sanctification of thy spirit, without which no man can see the Lord.—We desire to be humbled in thy glorious presence for the sins of this day; for the iniquity of our holy things; for our shortcomings, and our mis-doings. Surely all our personal righteousness are as filthy rags, in the eyes of thine infinite holiness; and our best performances, if brought to the test of thy perfect law, would but add to our condemnation, and enhance our punishment. But thou art a God gracious and merciful, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, through the ransom thou hast found and the Lamb which thou hast provided for a burnt-offering. Give us to see, that our guilt was transferred to him; that his obedience is imputed to us, and that we are through grace interested in all the blessings of the everlasting covenant. To the care and protection of thy almighty providence would we humbly commend ourselves this night. Take charge of us and our's, O thou Keeper of Israel, who never slumberest nor sleepest, watch over us for good. When we sleep, let our hearts wake and our souls lie open to the influence of thy blessed Spirit: keep us without sin, by the power of thy grace. If we have received any spiritual improvement to-day, Lord grant that it may abide with us, and increase with us ever more and more. Let it not be as the morning-dew, that quickly passes away; but fasten thy word upon our hearts, as a nail in a sure place. Cherish every motion of thy good spirit; begin the work of grace where it is not yet begun; and carry it on with power where it is. May our penitence be deep and lasting; may our faith be strong, lively and fervent; and build us up into living habitations of thee the living God. Sanctify and seal us thine, in body, soul and spirit. Sprinkle, according to thy own most gracious promise, clean water upon us, that we may be clean; from all our filthiness, and from all our idols, do thou cleanse us: a new heart also do thou give unto us, and a new spirit do thou put within us: take, O take away the stony heart out of our flesh, and give us hearts of flesh: put thy spirit within us, and cause us to walk in thy statutes, and to keep thy judgments and do them. May we, from principles of faith in thee and love to thee, be careful to maintain good works; and go on from strength to strength, until we are called to appear before the God of gods in Zion: there to celebrate that never-ending Sabbath, which angels and archangels, with the spirits of just men made perfect, are now enjoying before the throne. With them may we see thee as thou art; with them may we cast our crowns before thee; and sing the praises of the great Three-one, of the Father who loved us, of the Son who washed us from our sins in his own blood, and of the eternal Spirit who sanctified us by his grace, and preserved us to the day of Christ. Whatever we ask, we ask it at thy hand, for the merit's sake of thy dear Son, our only Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Lord bless us and keep us, &c.

MONDAY MORNING.

[Colle, before reading the Scripture.]

OPEN our eyes, O Lord, that we may discern the wonders of thy law; and rejoice our hearts with the knowledge of thy love. Take away our iniquities, and receive us graciously. Be light to our darkness, wisdom to our folly, and manifest thy strength in our weakness. Remember us according to the favour which thou bearest to thy own people; stir us up to seek thy face, and to lay hold on thy covenant: and make us find that it is indeed good for us to draw nigh unto thee, and to wait upon thee in and through the name and merits of Jesus Christ our only Mediator and Advocate.

[The Scripture being read and a Psalm sung, add as follows]

Our Father, &c.

Gracious and glorious Lord, the eyes of all wait upon thee; thou art the hope of all the ends of the earth. In thee we live and move and have our being: thou givest us life and breath and all things. Still thou takest care of us, and watchest over us; even in the hours of sleep, when we are unable to care for ourselves. And thy mercies are daily renewed; thy goodness is repeated every morning: yea, every moment dost thou give us fresh occasion of praise and thanksgiving. Blessed be thy name, for the peace, rest, and safety of the night past. Enable us, in the strength of thy grace and of thy gifts, to love thee truly, to serve thee faithfully, and to depend on thee without wavering. In all our ways, may we acknowledge thee; and be thou graciously pleased to establish our goings, and to direct our path. We desire to put ourselves under thy gracious conduct and thy fatherly protection. We beg the heavenly guidance, blessing and assistance of thy good spirit, to choose our inheritance for us, and to dispose of us, and all that concerns us, to the glory of thy great name. O Lord, withdraw not thy tender mercies from us, neither shut up thy loving kindness in displeasure. Though we deserve to lose thy favour and thy presence, yet grant us the comfort of thy help, and the joy of thy salvation, and uphold us with thy free spirit. Punish not our past offences, by leaving us to ourselves, and giving us up to the dominion of our sins; but give us penitent hearts for all the evil committed by us, and thy merciful discharge from all the guilt that lies upon us. And grant us, O good Lord, the comfortable sense and apprehension of thy free acceptance of us, and of thy gracious intentions toward us, in the Son of thy love, the lover of our souls; that our hearts may bless thee, and all that is within us may praise thy holy name.—Lord, keep us from sin this day. Subdue as well as pardon our iniquities: and herein may we exercise ourselves, to have always a conscience void of offence, both towards God and towards man.—Whilst upon earth, grant us a due supply of all things needful for us in the house of our pilgrimage. Sanctify to us our enjoyments and our employments, our comforts and our crosses, every condition we are to be in, and every event that shall befall us. Enable us to live to thy honour and glory: and make us to pass through things temporal, as neither to lose nor forget the things eternal. If thou enlighten us not, we shall run into error; if thou prevent not, we shall relapse into sin; if thou preserve us not, we shall fall into dangers. O let thy good providence be our defence and security; and thy Holy Spirit be our comforter, guide and counsellor, in all our ways: until, through the merits of thy Son, and the multitude of thy mercies, we are called away, to be for ever with the Lord. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

[Collect, before reading the Scripture.]

TEACH us, O Lord, the way of thy statutes, and make us keep it unto the end. Incline our hearts to thy testimonies, and cause us to go in the path of thy commandments, for therein is our desire. May the law of thy mouth be dearer unto us than thousands of gold and silver; and let thy Holy Spirit accompany thy word with saving power to our souls, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add as follows]

Our Father, &c.

Infinitely great and infinitely gracious God, thy glory exceeds our utmost thoughts, and thy mercies are over all thy works. We thy sinful creatures have particular reason to admire and adore not only thy patience which bears with us, notwithstanding all that we have done against thee; but likewise thy never ceasing bounty, by which our comforts are continued and our wants supplied. We desire to approach thee, as our kind and merciful Father in Jesus Christ: humbly beseeching thee to wash away our sins in his most precious blood; and to give us a sufficient measure of thy grace and Holy Spirit to enable us against them. Thou didst create man, O Lord, after thy own blessed image; but we have destroyed ourselves, and come short of thy glory: the crown is fallen from our heads, and woe unto us, for we are sinners both by nature and by practice: justly mightest thou swear in thy wrath that we shall not enter into thy rest. Yet suffer us, and enable us to plead in faith thy gracious promise, that whosoever trusteth in the Saviour thou hast provided, and cometh unto thee by him, shall never perish, nor fall into condemnation, but have everlasting life for his sake. Lord, we would believe; O help our unbelief! and work in us that unfeigned repentance towards God, and that right faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, that we may be of the number of them that do indeed repent and believe to the saving of the soul. Save us, O good Lord, from our sinful selves, and from the love of the present evil world, and from every thing that opposes thy grace and tends to hurt our souls. Establish us in thy love; strengthen us to perform thy will; and settle our faith on Christ the rock of ages.—To thy mercy in him we would humbly commit ourselves this night. Be our sun to enlighten us; be our shield to defend us. Grant us, if it please thee, rest of body and peace of mind. Let the voice of joy, health, and safety, be heard in our dwelling: make our walls salvation; and our gates praise.—Comfort all who want the comforts we enjoy: and grant suitable supplies of mercy, both spiritual and temporal, to all the afflicted, wheresoever they are, and howsoever tried.—Remember, with the favour that thou bearest to thy people, all our absent friends and relations: be thou a friend to them, and may they stand in a covenant relation to thee. Make them and us such as thou wouldst have us, and such as thou wilt accept of in Christ Jesus, here to thy gracious favour, and hereafter to thy glorious kingdom. Hear us, O God of the spirits of all flesh! Hear us in behalf of ourselves and others; hear others, in behalf of themselves and us: and convert those who pray neither for others nor themselves. Above all, hear the Son of thy love, the lover of our souls, who intercedes, we trust, for us at thy right hand. For him and to him, with thyself and the blessed Spirit, enable us to ascribe everlasting praise and glory. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

[Collect, before reading the Scripture.]

ALMIGHTY God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid; vouchsafe at this time to cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit: that we may perfectly love thee, worthily magnify thy holy name, and offer thee a sacrifice in righteousness, acceptable to thy glorious Majesty, in and through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add as follows]

Our Father, &c.

Blessed Lord, thine we are, and thee we ought to serve. The obligations of thy law, and the endearments of thy love, render it our indispensable duty to be faithful in the covenant, and to abound in the work of the Lord. But alas! we are unprofitable servants, and worse than unprofitable; for we have drunk in iniquity like water; our provocations against thee are increased, and our trespasses are grown up unto the heavens. We have lived to ourselves, instead of living unto him who died for us and rose again; we have not, as we should, glorified thee in our bodies and in our spirits, which are thine.—And since it is not in man to recover and save himself, O enable us to look unto thee, in whom alone our help lies. We thank thee for laying help upon one that is mighty; for committing thy people and the work of their salvation to the hands of him who hath finished transgression, made reconciliation for the iniquity of them that believe, and wrought out and brought in an everlasting righteousness, for their justification. In his name we come to thy throne of grace, hoping to obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need: for his sake we humbly intreat thy favour and the light of thy countenance; begging thee to be reconciled to us, and to be at peace with us, as a Father of mercies and a God of consolation. And, Lord, enable us to walk as becomes those upon whom thy name is called. May we be followers of Christ, as dear children, and adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. O circumcise our hearts, to love the Lord our God: and may thy Almighty Spirit so write the law of holiness upon our minds, that it may be our meat and our drink to do thy will; that we may hate all iniquity, and every false way; and resemble the blessed Jesus, as our pattern, while we trust in his merits as our propitiation. Lord, make our service acceptable to thee while we live, and our souls ready for thee when we die. As long as we are in the world, keep us from the evil of it, and from the snares and dangers to which we are continually exposed in our passage through it. O make our pilgrimage safe and sure through all the troubles, changes, and temptations of this mortal life, to the unchangeable glories and felicities of the life everlasting. Be merciful to us this day. Keep us in all our ways, bless all our lawful undertakings, and grant that we may take nothing in hand but what is warranted by thy word, and agreeable to thy will concerning us. Set thy fear before our eyes all the day long; and put thy love into our hearts, that we may not depart from thee. Bless and preserve us in our going out and coming in. May the angel of thy presence save us from all sin and danger. Hear and answer us, O Lord, for the sake of him who hath loved and redeemed us, even the Lord our righteousness, to whom he has ascribed the kingdom and power and glory. Amen.

The blessing of God Almighty, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be with us, and all that belong to us, this day, and evermore. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

[Collect, before reading the Scripture.]

O LORD, thou art good unto them that wait for thee, and to the soul that seeketh thee. We desire at this time to wait for thee, and to wait upon thee; and to seek thee in the way of thy appointment. Give us a token for good, and an answer of peace, while we draw near unto thee in the name of Jesus Christ our only Mediator and Redeemer. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add as follows]

Our Father, &c.

How excellent is thy mercy, O God! and what encouragement dost thou give us to put our trust under the shadow of thy wings! thou art the bountiful giver of the good that our souls desire, and the merciful withholder of the evil that our sins deserve. From thee comes all our help; and in thee make us repose all our hope. We acknowledge thy great and daily goodness to us; and our own absolute unworthiness of the least of all thy mercies. We desire to take shame and confusion to ourselves that we have so little improved, and so greatly abused thy patience with us, and the various instances of thy bounty toward us. Thy very mercies help to aggravate the heavy reckoning of our offences; because we have done so much against thee, after all the great things thou hast done and art continually doing for us. We would, O Lord, be penitent and humbled for our sins; and intreat thy gracious favour in Jesus Christ for the pardon of them. Forgive us, we pray thee, for his blood and righteousness sake; absolve us from all the evil of which we stand guilty before thee, and, being justified by faith, grant us peace with God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. And as we pray that thou wilt be to us a Father of mercies and a God of consolation, so also that thou wouldst make us followers of thee as dear children. Work in us, by thy Holy Spirit, that which is well pleasing in thy sight. Lord, thou knowest our weakness, and the temptations to which we are exposed: our dangers from the enemy of souls, and from the present world, which is full of snares; and, above all, from the enemy within, our vile flesh and deceitful hearts, so apt to betray us into sin. We pray therefore that thou wilt arm us with the whole armour of God, and uphold us with thy free Spirit; and watch over us for good evermore. O make us experience the strongest aids of thy heavenly grace; that we may never fall a prey to the spiritual adversary that seeks to devour us. And seeing thou art yet pleased to hold our souls in life, and to make us find and feel by every day's experience, how gracious and merciful thou art; give us hearts more sensible of thy love to us, more enflamed with love to thee, and more thankful for the blessings which thou art pleased to multiply upon us. And cause us to shew forth thy praise, not only by speaking good of thy name, but by ordering our conversations as becomes the gospel of Christ. To thy mercy in him do we humbly commend ourselves and ours this night : beseeching thee to visit us with thy salvation, and to preserve us, in soul and body, from all evils and dangers to which the weakness of our frame and the greatness of our sins expose us. May our repose be holy, safe, and refreshing ; that we may rise again better fitted and enabled to serve thee according to thy will in the duties of the following day, if it should be thy pleasure to make addition of another day to our lives. And as thou addest days and mercies add repentance and amendment to our days ; that in proportion as we draw nearer to the grave our souls may grow fitter for heaven. And for all the good things that we have had, and still have, and yet hope for at thy hands, to thy adorable name be all the praise, O Father, Son, and Spirit, world without end. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

[Collect, before reading the Scripture.]

UNTO thee do we lift up our eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens. Have respect, we humbly beseech thee, both to us and to our offerings, for the sake of him who offered up himself for our offences, and rose again for our justification. Meet us with a blessing who desire to meet thee in prayer, and make thy throne a throne of grace to us through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add]
Our Father, &c.

Lord God, bountiful and gracious, long suffering and abundant in goodness and truth ; thou keepest mercy for thousands, thou pardonest iniquity, transgression, and sin ; neither dost thou retain thy anger for ever, because thou delightest in mercy. Look down, O Lord, upon us, who would now be looking up to thee ; and be favourable to us as thou usest to be unto those that fear thy name. Look not upon the sin of our nature, nor the sins of our hearts and lives ; which are more than we can number, and greater than we can express. O sprinkle us from an evil conscience, by the application of the blessed Redeemer's blood which cleanseth from all sin. And, seeing there is in him an infinite fulness of all that ever we can want, or wish, to render us holy and to make us happy ; grant us to receive out of his fulness grace sufficient for us : grace to pardon our sins and subdue our iniquities ; to justify our persons and to sanctify our souls. Begin or carry on the new creation within ; advance in us that saving change of heart, which may be the power of thy Spirit ; more and more transform us into thy blessed image, and make us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. And now that we are entered upon another day, we beseech thee to carry us through it in thy fear and favour. Order all our steps in thy word, and let no wickedness have dominion over us. Teach us to use the world without abusing it ; and may that portion of it which thou hast and shall assign us be sanctified to us, by the word of God, and by prayer ; and by the right employment and improvement of it to thy glory. Whatever we are without, O leave us not destitute of the things that accompany salvation ; but satisfy us with the sense of thy favour, and adorn us with the graces of thy Holy Spirit. Blessed be thy rich goodness which has renewed our lives and thy mercies to us this morning. Lord grant that all our comforts may flow to us in the channel of covenant love, and revert to the praise and glory of the gracious giver. Be with, protect and bless us in our going out and coming in. May the angel of thy presence save us, and the God of angels be our shield and exceeding great reward. Make us desire, resolve, and endeavour to live in the obedience of thy holy will and to the honour of thy blessed name. O restrain us from the evils and follies into which we are prone to fall, and quicken us to the offices and duties we ought to perform. Grant that we may think and speak, will and do the things that are well-pleasing in thy sight ; and have the strong consolation of acceptance with thee. So visit us with thy salvation, sanctify us by thy grace, and so carry us through life that thy name may have the praise, and our souls the comfort, in the hour of death, and in the great day of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Lord bless us and keep us, &c.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

[Collect, before reading the Scripture.]

PREVENT us, O Lord, in all our doings, with thy most gracious favour, and further us with thy continual help ; that in this, and all other our works begun, continued, and ended in thee, we may glorify thy holy name, offer thee acceptable service, and finally, by thy mercy, obtain everlasting life ; through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add]
Our Father, &c.

Enable us, gracious God, to desire thee, as our chiefest good ; and to come to thee as our merciful Father in the Son of thy love. In his great name and prevailing mediation alone it is that we, who have multiplied our offences against thee, are encouraged still to present our persons and our prayers before thee. We are utterly unworthy to approach thy footstool, and to enjoy the privilege of intercourse with thee. We durst not appear in the presence of thy holy, glorious Majesty, in our own names, or trusting in our own sinful righteousness; our guilt is so great, and our iniquities so grievous, that we might justly be ashamed to come before thy face, and to tremble for fear of thy judgments. We would therefore fly for refuge to the merits of him who, we trust, has fully satisfied thy justice for our sins, and is now interceding at thy right hand for our souls; whom thou delightest to honour, in sparing, accepting, and saving poor unworthy sinners, upon his account. Deliver us, most gracious Lord, for his sake, from all those transgressions for which our hearts condemn us; and from all of which thou that art greater than our hearts knowest us to be guilty; and seal to us a full pardon in his most precious blood, which speaketh better things, on our behalf, than we are able to do for ourselves in all our prayers. And may the time past of our lives suffice to have lived to ourselves, and to have served our own corrupt wills. O put an end to all our presumptuous and treacherous dealings with thy heavenly all-seeing Majesty; and create in us new and clean, humble and contrite hearts, to tremble at thy word and presence, and to hate and abandon all our foolish and sinful misdoings. Command thy blessing, and thy saving grace, to descend and rest upon the souls here before thee. Cause us to know the joyful sound of thy gospel, not only by the hearing of the ear, but in the channel of heavenly experience. O take possession of our hearts, and by the power of thy Spirit draw up our affections to thy blessed self. Grant us union and communion with thee; such a sight and sense of sin, and of our lost estate by nature, as may render Christ and his righteousness precious to us; and such comfortable views of our justification through him as may enlarge our hearts with joy, fill our lips with praise, and influence us to live unto him that died for us and rose again.—Lord, guide and keep us: make us wise and faithful in our several duties, and blessed and prosperous in the event. Sanctify our respective conditions to us, and fit us for whatever thou shalt please to call us to.—And now, O Lord, we beseech thee to accept our evening sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving for the mercies of the day past, and for thy unwearied goodness which has followed us all the days of our lives. Go on to abound toward us in loving kindness and tender mercies; passing by our innumerable sins, and supplying our every want. Take charge of us to-night. Hide us in thy pavilion, and compass us about with songs of deliverance. Whether we sleep or wake, keep us safe under thy wings, and may our hearts be occupied in thy statutes. Bring us, at the appointed season, to the heavenly city, where there is no darkness, but the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. And for all thy patience with us, thy care over us, and thy continual mercy to us, blessed be thy name, O Lord, Father, Son, and Spirit. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

THOU, O God, art praised in Sion. Angels and archangels, saints below and saints above, the whole family of thy elect, both in heaven and earth, worship thee, the fountain of all blessedness, and the giver of all good. We likewise, the chief, but not the least favoured, of sinners, desire to join the company of thy redeemed, and to offer up our spiritual sacrifices. Accept, great God, the mite we bring; pardon the iniquity that cleaves to our duties; meet us with a blessing: and receive us graciously, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add

Our Father, &c.

O thou, who hast borne so long with us, and done so much for us; of whom alone cometh our salvation, and by whom we escape death! moved by the sense of our own necessities, and encouraged by the daily experience of thy mercies, we desire still to shelter ourselves under the shadow of thy wings, and to continue our supplications at the throne of thy grace; most humbly intreating thee, who fashionest the hearts of the sons of men, that thou wouldest prepare our hearts to come into thy sacred presence, and to call upon thy blessed name. O pour down upon us the Spirit of grace and of supplications; yea, let thy good Spirit help our infirmities, and teach us how to pray. We, who are but poor worms, and sinful dust and ashes, have taken upon us to speak to thee, the Sovereign Majesty of heaven and earth: we, who have too much cause to fear, lest our great and manifold sins might provoke thee to hide thy face from us, and to shut up thy loving kindness in displeasure against us. Lord be merciful to us sinners; for the sake of him whom thou hast exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance unto his people, and forgiveness of sins. Heal our souls, which have greatly sinned against thee: heal our backslidings, and love us freely: take away our ungodliness, and thou shalt find none. Renew us daily unto repentance; establish our hearts in thy faith and fear; and hold up our goings in thy paths that our footsteps slip not. Make us in the strength of grace go on from conquering to conquer all the enemies of our souls, and all the hindrances of our salvation, until thou hast bruised Satan under our feet.

We bless thee for the mercies of the night. We laid us down to sleep, and have risen again, for thou hast sustained us, and made us to dwell in safety. May we ever experience the comfort of thy protection, and the help of thy salvation! may we find thee to be indeed a God of pardon, a God of sanctification, and a God of preservation!—Dispose of us, we beseech thee, and of all that concerns us, this day, to the glory of thy name. Keep us, at all times, in all places, and in all companies, from the evil of sin and from all other evils to which the greatness of our sins makes us liable. And take thou, O heavenly Father, the charge, guidance, and government of us; lead us by thy counsel, until thou hast brought us to thy kingdom and glory: and in the meanwhile sanctify to us all thy dealings with us, and seal us thine to the day of redemption; for the sake of thy tender mercies, and the abundant merits of Jesus Christ, our blessed Mediator and Redeemer.

The Lord bless us, &c.

THURSDAY EVENING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

ALMIGHTY God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid; vouchsafe, at this time, to cleanse the thoughts of our hearts, by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit; that we may perfectly love thee, and worthily magnify thy holy name, through Christ our Lord.
Amen.

[Reading and singing being ended, add]

Our Father, &c.

O Lord, the infinite incomprehensible God; thou hast heaven for thy throne, and earth for thy footstool; and all things are in thy sight and at thy disposal. Thou art the searcher of our hearts, and the overseer of our lives, here and every where present. Thou compassest our path, and our lying down, and art acquainted with all our ways. Lord, put our hearts into a holy frame, fit to attend upon thy glorious, all-seeing Majesty. Work in us, by the power of thy grace, that change which we cannot work in ourselves: for, of ourselves, we are equally vile and helpless. We were born sinners, and sinners we have lived and continued, and, by continually adding sin to sin, we have made ourselves still more the children of wrath than we even were by nature. Justly mightest thou withdraw thy tender mercies from us, and pour out thy wrath and indignation upon us to the uttermost; making us to find and feel, by woful experience, what an evil and bitter thing it is to depart from thee the living God: but thy patience is wonderful, thy goodness is infinite, and, as is thy Majesty, so is thy mercy. We therefore humbly beseech thee to stretch forth the hand of thy power and grace, which alone is able to set us at liberty, who are tied and bound with the chain of our sins. Call us effectually, and we shall come unto thee; draw us, and we shall run after thee. Cause us to feel, to abhor, and to forsake our iniquities: and O! give us a well grounded apprehension, and a comfortable persuasion, of our being justified freely by thy grace through the redemption that is in Jesus.—And, for his sake, vouchsafe us the sanctification of thy Spirit, to transform us into thy image, by the renewing of our minds, and to enable us for all the duties of thy service. Perfect, O Lord, that which concerneth us: and make us such, both in our hearts and lives, that we may enjoy thy peace below, and be meet for the inheritance of thy heavenly glory above. Satisfy us with thy favour; and grant us the reviving sense of thy gracious acceptance of us, and of thy merciful intentions toward us. Speak peace to our consciences; say to each of our souls, “I am thy salvation:” that we may rejoice in thee as our God, and rest upon thee as our reconciled Father in Jesus Christ. And as thou hast been good and kind to us through the day past (for which, and for the mercies of all our days, we would thankfully admire thy love and bless thy name), so we beg that we may experience the continuance of thy gracious goodness to us, and of thy fatherly care over us, this present night. Preserve and defend, bless and keep us, that no evil may happen to us, nor any plague come nigh our dwelling. Do thou, who givest unto thy beloved sleep, vouchsafe to favour us with such needful repose as may refresh and strengthen us for thy service and our respective duties. Prepare us, great God, for the final sleep of death, and for the account we must shortly give at the judgment seat of Christ. When our souls shall be required of us, and we are unclothed of the body, grant that we may not be found spiritually naked; unsprinkled with the blood of thy Son, unclothed with the robe of his justifying righteousness, nor unadorned with the graces of thy sanctifying Spirit. O cause us, in this our day (the day of life, the only season of preparation), to know, and to follow after, the things pertaining to our everlasting peace, before they are hid from our eyes, and ere death make us wise too late. Accomplish the work of thy grace upon our hearts, and cause us to finish the work thou hast given us to do: that whenever thou shalt be pleased to send us away, we may have nothing to do but to depart in peace, according to thy word, to fly at thy signal—to quit the body with cheerfulness—and with faith and without dread, resign our spirits into thy gracious hands; trusting in the riches of thy grace, and the saving merits of thy blessed Son; and for all that he has so wonderfully effected to recover us, and to obtain eternal redemption for us; for whatever thou hast wrought in us, and for the hope of glory thou hast given us: to thy name, O blessed God of our salvation, be the praise and honour, now and for ever. Amen.

---

FRIDAY MORNING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

By thee, O Lord, alone it is that we laid us down in peace, and are risen again in safety. May the lives, which thy goodness renews every morning, and thy providence preserves every moment, be devoted to thee; and, as a father spareth his own son that serveth him, so may the Lord our God continue to have mercy upon us, through Jesus Christ, our blessed Mediator and Redeemer.

[Reading and singing ended, add]

O Lord, we desire to adore thy name, which is excellent in all the earth, and whose glory is above the heavens. Thou art the maker and disposer of all things; and for thy sovereign pleasure it is that they still exist, and were at first created. Thy hands have made and fashioned us; and all that we enjoy comes from thee. As we are the workmanship of thy power, O make us likewise thy spiritual workmanship, created anew in Christ Jesus, unto holiness and true righteousness. Give proof that thou hast formed us for thyself, by causing us to shew forth thy praise; and by making us live to glory, as we do every day live upon thy bounty. But, Lord, we have not yielded thee that glory which thou hast made us capable of, and so many mercies obliged us to. We are prone to forget thee, who art never unmindful of us; and to disobey thee, whose goodness to us is unwearied. For these things, O Lord, for the sinfulness of our nature and of our lives, we desire to pour out our hearts, and to humble our guilty selves before thee: entreating thee, for the sake of thy dear Son, and of thy mercies in him, to work in us true repentance, and to grant us full and free forgiveness. Strengthen us, O Lord, with might, by thy Spirit, in the inner man, to make us watchful against and victorious over the corruption of our hearts, the temptations of Satan, and the sinful cares and allurements of the world. O destroy in us every root of bitterness, every plant which thy grace hath not planted; exterminate every vicious habit and rebellious motion which exalts itself against the knowledge of God, against the obedience of our Lord Jesus Christ. Increase and confirm in us, more and more, thy faith and fear and love. Let not one grace of thy Holy Spirit be wanting; let not one be weak: but grant us such manifestations of thyself, and so conform us to the image of thy holiness, that our lives may be comfortable to ourselves, profitable to others, and bring glory to thy great name. May we still be found in the way of duty, fearing God and working righteousness; making it evident unto all that we have indeed been with Jesus, that we have learned of him, that we are influenced by his Spirit, guided by his example, and are pressing forward to his kingdom. Day by day would we magnify thee, O Lord, and worship thy name for ever, world without end; who crownest every day with thy tender mercies. We bless thee for the rest, protection, and preservation of the last night. O cause us to hear thy loving kindness in the morning, for in thee do we trust: make us to know the way wherein we should go, for we lift up our souls unto thee. Cast us not away from thy presence; take not thy Holy Spirit from us; but direct our hearts into thy love, and our feet into the way of thy testimonies. Whether we eat, or drink, or whatsoever we do, we may do all to the glory of God, and walk, as seeing him that is invisible.—Command thy angels to encamp around us, and to bear us in their hands; and may their God and ours be the strength of our hearts, the guide of our goings, and our portion for ever and ever Amen.

---

FRIDAY EVENING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

BLESSED are they, O Lord, who dwell in thy house, and blessed is the house where thou dwellest: blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, and in whose heart are thy ways. May that blessedness be ours, and may the Lord, whom we seek, visit us with his presence, and rejoice us with the tokens of his love, in and through his adorable Son, and our adorable Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

[Reading and singing ended, add]

Our Father, &c.

O Lord, we desire to seek thy face, and to wait upon thee in the duties of thy worship. To whom should we make our applications, but unto thee, the father of mercies, and the fountain of all goodness, who art able to do exceeding abundantly for us, even above all that we are able to ask or think: O let our prayer be set forth in thy sight as incense; and may the lifting up of our hands and hearts be a spiritual evening sacrifice, acceptable to thee, in the Son of thy love. It is in his blessed name alone that we dare to request of thee all thou knowest to be needful and expedient for us: seeing that there is in us no good thing to recommend us to thy favour and acceptance; but, on the contrary, a proneness and inclination to what is displeasing unto thee and destructive to our souls. For besides that we are, by nature, children of wrath and a seed of evil doers; we have been daily adding to the heavy score of our offences against thee. There is nothing in us, O Lord, but what may provoke thee to reject us; for all our righteousnesses themselves are filthy rags: but there is enough, in thy beloved Son, of all grace and goodness, to make thee well-pleased with us for his sake. He, who knew no sin, bore our sins, and was made a sin offering, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us near unto thee. For his sake, blot out our manifold transgressions, apply the benefits of thy salvation to our conscience, that we may be enabled to walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance: hasten thy coming and kingdom, that we, with all thy redeemed, may join in ascribing songs of praise to a Triune God, for ever and ever. To the care and protection of thy Almighty providence we would humbly commend ourselves this night. Take charge of us and ours, O thou Keeper of Israel, who never slumberest nor sleepest, watch over us for good. When we sleep, let our hearts wake; and our souls lie open to the influence of thy blessed Spirit; keep us without sin by the power of thy grace: gracious Lord, shower down thy blessings upon us, the unworthy family now before thee: let the voice of joy and health be heard in this dwelling: let thy peace be within these walls, and the plenteousness of thy salvation within these gates: make this an house of prayer, and every soul within it a living temple of thee, the living God, through Jesus Christ, our only Mediator and Advocate. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

BLESSED Lord, who hast caused all thy holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort of thy holy word, we may embrace, and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ.

[Reading and singing ended, add]

Our Father, &c.

Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks: yea, unto thee will we give thanks, because thy name also is so high, and that do thy wondrous works declare. We beseech thee, gracious God, to hear us mercifully at this time; pardon our manifold sinfulness, and supply our manifold wants. Write the law of thankfulness upon our hearts for the experience we have already had of thy goodness, and kindly go on to be nigh unto us, in all that we call upon thee for. Wash away the sins of the last night, and those of this day hitherto: who can tell how oft we offend? none but thou that knowest all things. O cleanse thou us from our secret faults, and from our original depravity, the source of all; may we be justified fully, freely, and finally, by thy grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus, and sanctified by the renewing efficacy of thy blessed Spirit. Bless us in this our private waiting upon thee, we are gathered together, in thy name, at the footstool of thy grace; Lord Jesus, be in the midst of us, and give unto us a comfortable view of our interest in thy precious merits. Thy righteousness, bloodshedding, and intercession, are the altar which sanctifies every sacrifice of prayer and praise which we offer up. Thou makest both the persons and the performances of thy people acceptable to the Father, mingle our addresses with the incense of thy intercession, and then they will go up as a memorial before God. O thou risen and ascended Saviour, may our hearts and affections tend upwards to thy throne in heaven, that by faith in thy adorable person and infinite merits, and by the exercise of continual obedience and deadness to the world, we may safely hope to be with thee, where thou art, there to behold thy glory. O thou uncreated majesty, we acknowledge that all the blessings of a spiritual and temporal cast, that we have received, from our existence to this day, are of thy free and unmerited goodness; were the distributions of thy favours to be regulated by our deservings, they would soon be withdrawn. Therefore not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be the praise and the glory ascribed. Hear us, O God of salvation, and do more for us than we are able to ask or think, for the sake of thy Son, our Redeemer; to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, three co-equal persons, in the unity of one Godhead, be ascribed all glory and adoration, by the Church above and the Church below, for ever and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

[Collect before reading the Scripture.]

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, who art always more ready to hear than we to pray, and art wont to give more than either we desire or deserve; pour down upon us the abundance of thy mercy: forgiving us those things whereof our consciences are afraid, and giving us those good things which we are not worthy to ask, much less to receive, but through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ our Lord, in whom we desire to be found, and in his name do we now approach the throne of thy grace, and make mention of his righteousness only as the ground of our justification in the sight of our heavenly Father: to whom, with the blessed Spirit, be ascribed all honour and dominion, world without end. Amen.

[After reading and singing, add as follows]

Our Father, &c.

Wherewith shall we come before thee, O Lord? or bow ourselves in thy presence, O thou most high God? Cause us to come unto thee in faith: mentioning no other name, pleading no other righteousness, and trusting in no other atonement than the name, righteousness, and atonement of thy blessed Son, and our adorable Mediator Jesus Christ. In him we desire to be found; through him we hope for favour with thee, and acceptance in thy sight. Blessed be thy goodness for the mercies of the day, for the blessings of thy providence, the comforts of thy Spirit, and the privileges we enjoy.—We thank thee that we have been protected from danger, and, above all, if we have been in any measure withheld by grace from sinning against thee. Sinners we are, and sinned against thee we have even at the best of times, and in the best of frames; but, Lord, make us thankful for the desire which thou hast given us, of living unto thee, and oh! make our desires effectual through the mighty working of thy Spirit, who is able to subdue even our rebellious hearts to himself: Lord, wash out the transgressions of this day, and of this week now nearly closing. Look upon the covenant of thy grace, and, through the blood of the covenant, forgive us all our sins, and cancel the hand-writing that is against us, and nail it to the cross. Purge us with hyssop, and we shall be clean; wash us, and we shall be whiter than snow. Shouldest thou lay judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, shouldest thou deal with us after our sins, or reward us according to our deserts, or if thou wast to enter into judgment with us, upon the footing of our best performances, alas! we could not stand in thy presence, nor be justified in thy sight. Our prayers, our praises, our alms-deeds, and all we are and do, if weighed in the balance of the sanctuary, and brought to the test of thy perfect law, would be found not only deplorably deficient, but altogether lighter than vanity itself—yet, though we are vile, thou art gracious. We bless thee for that rich provision of grace and glory which thou hast made for thy penitent people, in the righteousness, sacrifice, and intercession of him who is their advocate with the Father, and the propitiation for their sins. Thou hast delivered thy redeemed from going down into the pit, by contriving, finding, and accepting a ransom for them. O certify us, by thy blessed Spirit, and by the tokens of grace, that we are of the happy number: that we are loved by thee with an everlasting love, interested in the sure mercies of David. Continue thy goodness towards us to-night; may we, as the beloved of the Lord, dwell in safety by him. Make us rest under thy defence, O thou Most High, and abide under the shadow of the Almighty. Thy mercies to us have been equally great, numerous, and unmerited; may we ever experience thee to be a God of love. Perfect, O Lord, that which concerneth us, and forsake not the work of thy own hands. Bless us with thy presence, thy grace, and thy protection. Suffer not the enemy to have any advantage over us; neither let the son of wickedness approach to hurt us.

Be with all thine every where. Visit them, in particular, with thy salvation, whom we desire to bear upon our hearts before thee. May those who are near and dear to us be near and dear to God: and, whatever separation thy good providence may make upon earth, O grant that we and they may meet with joy at thy right hand in the hour of death and in the day of judgment.—Bless the sinful nations of which we are a sinful part. Maintain the cause of thy truth, and enlarge the kingdom of thy Son, amongst us. Remember for good thy faithful people of every denomination; more especially regard with thy choicest favour and defend with thy mighty power the Church to which we belong; the gospel vine which thy own right hand hath planted; and which, by thy gracious providence, hath taken root and filled the land. May she extend her boughs from sea to sea, until they have filled the whole earth! may we abide by her doctrines, and walk worthy of the holy vocation with which we are called.—Bless thy servant the king: the queen: and every branch of his illustrious house. May the crown sit easy, and sit very long, upon his royal head. Direct his counsels to the advancement of thy glory, the good of thy Church, and the safety, honour, and welfare of himself and his dominions.—May all orders and degrees of men, from the highest to the lowest, be fearers of God, lovers of truth, and workers of righteousness; strengthen and relieve those who labour under any affliction in mind, body, or estate, and make all work together for their good.—Preserved by thy gracious mercy, we are coming near to the end of another week; many of our fellow creatures, since the commencement thereof, have left this scene, and have entered upon an eternal state. O God most holy, O God most mighty, grant that, before our eyes close in death, we may be enabled to embrace the Lord's Christ in the arms of our faith, and under the shinnings of thy countenance, and in the unclouded prospect of thy celestial abode, saying, Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation. Carry us holy, peaceably and safely, through the ensuing Sabbath. Lift up the light of thy countenance upon us, and may our comforts be neither few nor small. In all the duties that are before us may we look to the Spirit of grace, for willingness and power to serve thee faithfully, and may our entire dependence be upon the merits of Jesus Christ the righteous, to render our defective, polluted service such as thou wilt mercifully accept in him. Be thou on to-morrow present in the worshipping assemblies of thy saints; meet them that desire to meet with thee, and visit them with thy salvation who mean to visit and wait on thee in the ordinances of thy appointment; may such as seek thee be joyful and glad in thee; and may they find, by happy experience, that one day in thy courts is better than a thousand elsewhere, and that thy house is indeed the house of God, and the gate of heaven. Be with all thy faithful stewards of thy mysteries in every place, who shall administer in thy name. Enable them rightly to divide the word of truth, giving both to saints and sinners their portion. Pardon the unworthiness of ministers and people, and vouchsafe to own thy glorious gospel, by making it effectual to the salvation of them that hear; every spiritual and temporal mercy we request for the alone sake of Jesus Christ the righteous. Amen.

---

ADVERTISEMENT.

It is presumed this little manual of devotion, taken from the manuscript papers of our author, will not be unacceptable to the public, because it is set forth as a form of prayer.

Amongst the many unnecessary disputes in the Christian department, a question has been often propounded, whether a person can present himself at the footstool of the divine Majesty, using the words of another, and be a sincere worshipper; certainly, in our private or recluse devotions, it is proper to come before God, and pour out in simplicity and sincerity the immediate mental solicitations that we are in need of, expecting our imperfect aspirations to be accepted only through the mediation of the Lord Jesus. But some indiscreet, captious individuals, have prematurely censured those who have adopted a premeditated course of prayer in their families, or in public assemblies, as the quintessence of hypocrisy, and the apathy of insensibility. By this criterion, may not the same suggestions be urged against the universality of singing psalms or hymns? If such poetic compositions, which consist of prayer and thanksgiving, are used as a form, wherein can be the impropriety or inconsistency of a devout supplicant offering the same in prose? How assuming must it be in any person to take upon himself the inquisitorial part of prejudging the uprightness of another, and bearing down the honest efforts of a humble mind, before that period arrives when the secrets of all hearts will be made known. Let us in the interval anticipate that eventful crisis, when we shall enter upon that state where there will be nothing to pray for, but every thing to be thankful for, where mental imperfections will be absorbed in the lustre of uncreated perfection, and every thing give place to unmingled and unalloyed adorations to God and the Lamb for ever.

EDITOR.

---

SKETCH OF A SERMON

ON

JOHN VII. 38, 39.

“He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly (heart) shall flow rivers of living water.

“This spake he of the Spirit; which they that believe on him should receive.”

ONE would imagine that Christ, who is the prince of peace; that his gospel, which is the message of peace; and that his ministers, who are the ambassadors of peace; should meet with general acceptance, and be received with joy by all to whom the message comes. But our Lord, who knew what was in man, and to whose eye the whole of futurity lies open at one view, has taught us to expect a very different effect from the faithful publication of his word. It is true that, by his mediatorial obedience unto death, he has made peace with God, and procured remission of sins, for as many as shall believe in his name: and it is the office of the Holy Spirit to enlighten believers into the knowledge of the peace and salvation obtained for them by Christ. Yet, with regard to those who are consigned to hardness of heart and to the blindness of unbelief, the proclamation of peace, sounded by the gospel-trumpet, seldom fails to fill their minds with enmity, and to enflame them with rage and embitterment against both the message and its messenger.

What is the reason of this? Why are the hearts of unconverted people prone to swell with opposition against the saving truths of God's word? Because those truths run directly counter to the natural prejudices and the corrupt reasonings of self-righteous pride. It stings a Pharisee, who looks for salvation from his own doings, to be told that all who get to heaven must be brought thither, not by works of righteousness which they have done, but by the free, unmingled grace of God in Christ. It quite affronts the free-willer to be informed that it is God himself who, by the power of his Spirit, must work in us both to will and to do those things that are pleasing in his sight. Hence it is that the gospel of Christ so often meets with hatred and repulse: and hence that remarkable saying, Luke xii. 51, 52: "Suppose ye, that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, Nay: but rather, division. For, from henceforth," &c. The truth is, they who receive the gospel must ever expect to be nibbled at by those who do not receive it: and the apostle's observation, Gal. iv. 29, holds as good, at this present day, as it did when he first committed it to paper.

Only review the foregoing part of this chapter, and see whether Christ himself was exempt from hatred, persecution, and abuse.

Ver. 1. After these things, i. e. after he had miraculously fed five thousand persons in the wilderness, Jesus walked in Galilee: "walked," literally, he generally travelled on foot: we read but once of his having rode, and that was on an ass, and merely to fulfil the prophecy, "Walked," figuratively: his life was not a life of idleness, but of zeal, activity, and labour.—Because the Jews sought, &c. He could have preserved himself, but uses retirement as a means: to teach us not lightly to presume on providence, but to trust God in the ways of his appointment. Besides, his hour was not come, and he had more work to do.

Ver. 2. Feast of tabernacles: annually celebrated (a) in commemoration of their having dwelt in tents for forty years, in their journey from Egypt to Canaan. An emblem of Christ's incarnation; and of the passage of the elect through the world to heaven.

Ver. 3. His brethren; i. e. some of the Virgin Mary's relations: for the Jews called all near kinsmen, especially first cousins, brethren. Literally, Christ had no brethren: as God, he is the only Son of the Father: as man, he was the first and the last, and the only son of his mother. Depart hence: put thyself into danger's way, by going among thy most virulent foes, in order to work a miracle (if thou be the Messiah) for thy own rescue.

Ver. 4. As much as to say, "thou art ostentatious: therefore go and work thy miracles at Jerusalem, among the great men of the law, the Scribes and Pharisees."

Ver. 5. Of so little spiritual benefit are merely outward advantages, without the saving grace of God.

Ver. 6. How meekly Christ answers! i. e. "Every step I take is regulated by the immediate interposition of Providence; and, when the time appointed arrives for my being at Jerusalem, I shall go. It matters not when you go; but every moment of my time is charged with some important commission for the glory of God!"

Ver. 7. Men of the world do not hate one another as such. Their hatred turns chiefly towards the excellent of the earth; and, above all, on faithful ministers.

Ver. 12. Much murmuring: They were divided in their opinion of him.

Ver. 13. Spake openly, what they thought in his favour.

Ver. 14. Midst of the feast: when the number of worshippers was largest. Christ knew not what the fear of man was. To the Temple: to pray, and preach. Christ's own example sanctifies and enforces the duties of public worship. I fear, if Christ was to live again on earth, he would not have the privilege of preaching in some of our churches: many a pulpit door would be shut against him.

Ver. 17. Εαν τις θελη, if any man be willing, or have a desire. A spiritual will and desire to heavenly things is the gift of God, and a token for good.—This whole verse shows that the grand reason why any disrelish the pure gospel is, because they are unrenewed by grace.

Ver. 18. Of himself: Plausible doctrines of his own dressing up.—Is true: he preaches the truth, simply as he finds it in the word. No unrighteousness; no dishonesty, no sophistication, nor artful glossing of God's word.

Ver. 25. Whom they seek to kill: But they were restrained by invisible power which they knew nothing of.

Ver. 26. He speaketh boldly: The more they threatened, the more boldly Christ preached.

Ver. 28. Whom ye know not: Sad to profess God, and yet not know him savingly!

Ver. 37. If any man thirst Alluding to the Jewish custom, at their feast, of pouring water on the sacrifice as it lay on the altar. Christ shews the spiritual meaning of this. Himself was the one sacrifice; and the Holy Ghost, compared in Scripture to water, anointed him as Mediator for the discharge of his offices, and gives us faith by which his merits are applied to the soul. Come: i. e. believe.—Drink: be satisfied, comfortable, and happy.

(a) See Jennings's Jewish Antiq. Vol. ii.

Ver. 38. Believers as the Scripture, &c. : i. e. as the scriptural faith of God's elect.

Out of his heart : The heart is the seat of vital religion.

Rivers, &c. His heart shall overflow with, 1. The comforts of the Spirit ; 2. With good works, which, like elegant streams in a garden, shall enrich and adorn his life and conversation.

Compared to rivers, because, 1. As all rivers derive their origin from the sea, so all grace and holiness flow from the ocean of God's gratuitous love to us in Christ ;—2. A river widens, the farther it flows ; and a converted believer increases in the knowledge of God, and in obedience, more and more, to the perfect day.—3. A river tends to the sea whence it took its rise : and all true grace leads to God, and at last perfectly unites the soul to him in glory.

Living waters : i. e. 1. Operative ; 2. Perpetual.

Ver. 39. Of the Spirit : See Isa. xli. 17, 18, and xlv. 3. Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 27.

Broad Hembury, March 20, 1770

THE SCHEME

OF

CHRISTIAN AND PHILOSOPHICAL NECESSITY ASSERTED ;

IN OPPOSITION TO MR. JOHN WESLEY'S TRACT ON THAT SUBJECT.

"Aded stat et permanet invicta sententia, omnia necessitate fieri. Nec est hic ulla obscuritas, aut ambiguitas. In Esaiâ dicit [Deus] consilium meum stabit, et voluntas mea fiet. Quis enim puer non intelligit quid velint hæc vocabula, consilium, voluntas, fiet, stabit?" Luther, de servo Arbitrio, sect. 19.

"Quæ nobis videtur contingentia, secretum Dei impulsu fuisse gnoscet fides." Calvin, Institut. l. i. c. 19.

"Quid igitur, inquires, nullane est in rebus, ut istorum vocabulo utar, contingentia? Nihil casus? Nihil fortuna?—Omnia necessario evenire Scripturæ docent." Melancthon, Loc. Com. P. 10. Edit. Argentor. 1522.

"There is not a fly but has had infinite wisdom concerned, not only in its structure, but in its destination." Dr. Young's Cent. not fab. Letter II.

PREFACE.

YESTERDAY'S post brought me a packet from London, including, among other papers, a small tract, recently published by Mr. John Wesley, entitled, "Thoughts upon Necessity." I had no sooner perused those "Thoughts," than I resolved to bring them to the test : and am now setting about it.

During some years past, I have, for the most part, stood patient, & the defensive against this gentleman. 't is high time that I take my turn to invade the arms of truth into the enemy's own territory.

Mr. Wesley's tract above mentioned was sent to me by a well-known, and very deserving, London clergyman ; so much of whose letter as relates to the said tract shall, for the amusement of my readers, be submitted to their view.

"I went last night to the (a) Foundery, expecting to hear Pope John ; but was disappointed. After hearing a Welshman for an hour and twenty minutes, on Psalm lxxxiv. 11, preach up all the heresies of the place, a man who sat in the pulpit told him to 'give over ;' for he seemed to bid fair for another half hour, at least. But he came to a conclusion as desired. Then this man, who seemed a local preacher, stood up, with a pamphlet in his hand, and addressed the auditory in the following manner :

"I am desired to publish a pamphlet upon Necessity and Free-will ; the best extant that I know of, in the English tongue (b) ; by Mr. John Wesley, price three pence. I had purposed to have said a good deal upon it, but the time is elapsed. But in this three-penny pamphlet, you have all the disputes that have been bandied about so lately. And you will get your minds more established by this three-penny pamphlet, than by reading all the books that have been written for and against. It is to be had at both doors as you go out.

"I beg leave" (adds my reverend friend) "to transmit you this here said three-penny wonder."

Upon the whole, this must have been a droll sort of mountebank scene. Attended, however, with one most melancholy and deplorable circumstance, arising from the unreasonable and unseasonable prolixity of the long-winded holderforth ; which cruelly, injudiciously, and despitefully, prevented poor Zany from puffing off, with the amplitude he fully intended, the multiplex virtues of the doctor's three-penny free-will powder.

Never do that by delegation, says an old

(a) Mr. Wesley's principal meeting-house in London.

(b) Query. Does the said lay preacher, whoever he may be, know ought of any other tongue?

proverb, which you can as well do in propria personâ. Had Dr. John himself got upon the stage, and sung,

"Come, buy my fine powders, come buy dem of me, Hare be de best powders dat ever you see;"

Who knows but the three-penny doses might have gone off, "at both doors," as rapidly as peas from a pop-gun?

My business for a few spare hours shall be to amuse myself by analyzing this redoubtable powder. The chemical resolution of so inestimable a specific into its component parts (a specific,

"The like whereto was never seen, Nor will again, while grass is green,")

may, moreover, be of very great and signal use. It were pity that the materia medica of which it is made up, should remain a secret, especially as the good doctor designed it for general benefit. To make which benefit as universal as I can, I do hereby give notice unto all philosophers, divines, and others, who have poisoned their entrails by unwarily taking too deep a draught of Necessity: that they may at any time, by help of the following decomposition, have it in their power to mix up, for their own immediate recovery, a competent quantum of the famous Moorfields powder: whose chief ingredients are,

An equal portion of gross Heathenism, Pelagianism, Mahometism, Popery, Manicæism, Ranterism, and Antinomianism; culled, dried, and pulverized, secundem artem: and, above all, mingled with as much palpable Atheism as you can possibly scrape together from every quarter.

Hæ tibi erunt artes. Follow the above prescription to your life's end, and you will find it a most pleasant, speedy, and infallible antidote against every species and effect of the baneful necessitarian night-shade. It is the felix malum,

—Quo non presentius ullum (Pocula si quando sævæ infecere noverce, Miscueruntque herbas, et non innoxia verba)
Auxilium venet, ac membris agit atra Venena. (c)

But though Mr. John Wesley is the vender and the ostensible proprietor of this efficacious three-penny medicine; the original discovery of the nostrum is by no means his own. He appears to have pilfered the substance, both of his arcana medendi, and of his cavils against the true philosophy of colours, from the refuted lucubrations with which a certain North-British professor hath edified and enriched the literary public. Let the simple, however, be on their guard lest Mr. Wesley's spiritual medicines have as pernicious influence on their minds as the quack remedy which he (d) recommends for the gout, had on the life of Dr. T—d, the late worthy dean of N—ch.

By way of direct introduction to the following sheets, allow me to premise an extract from the commentary of a very great man, on those celebrated lines of Juvenal:

"Nullum numen habes si sit pudentia;
sed te nos facimus, fortuna, deam, cœloque locamus.

"Dicit autem hoc poeta, ob fortunam: quæ non solum nullum numen est, sed nusquam et nihil est. Nam cum sciamus omnia in mundo, maxima et minima, providentia, Dei gubernari; quid restat de fortuna, nisi vanum et inane nomen?—Unde rectè dicitur tolle ignorantiam e personis, fortunam de rebus sustuleris. Quia enim homines rerum omnium causas non perspicimus, ut est mortalium cæcitas; fortunam nescio quam vagam, irritam, instabilem, nobis fingimus. Quod si causas rerum latentes et abditas nobis inspicere daretur; non modo nullam esse talem fortunam videremus, verum etiam omnium minima, singulari Dei providentia, regi. Et sic fortuna nihil aliud est, quam Dei providentia, sed nobis non perspecta. Et recte divinus ille Seneca: fortuna, fatum natura, omnia ejusdem Dei nomina, varie sua potestate utentis." (e) i. e. "The poet, in this place, levels his arrows at fortune or chance: which is not only no goodness, but a mere nothing, and has no existence any where. For since it is certain that all things in the world, both little and great, are conducted by the providence of God; what is chance, but an empty and unmeaning name? Hence it has been rightly observed, Take away man's ignorance, and chance vanishes in a moment. The true reason why any of us are for set-the recipe itself is to be found there. Which demonstrates the unskillful temerity wherewith the compiler sets himself up as a physician of the body. Should his quack pamphlet come to another edition, it is to be hoped that the beef steak remedy will, after so authentic and so melancholy a probatum est, be expunged from the list of specifics for the gout. It is, I acknowledge, an effectual cure. Cut off a man's head, and he will no more be annoyed by the tooth ache. Alas, for the ingenium velox, and for the audacia perditâ, with which a rash empiric, like Juvenal's Græculus esuriens, lays claim to universal science!

Grammaticus, Rhetor, Geometres, Pictor Adeptes,
Auror, Schenobates, Medicus, Magus! Omnia novit!
(c) Lubini Comment. in Juvenal, Sat. 0 p. 424.
Edit. Hanovæ, 1619.

(c) Georgic 1. 2. 127.

(d) In Mr. Wesley's book of Receipts, entitled "Primitive Physic," he advises persons who have the gout in their feet or hands to apply raw lean beef steaks to the part affected, fresh and fresh every twelve hours. Somebody recommended this dangerous repellant to Dr. T. in the year 1764, or early in 1765. He tried the experiment. The gout was in consequence driven up to his stomach and head, and he died, a few days after, at Bath; where I happened to spend a considerable part of those years; and where, at the very time of the Dean's death, I became acquainted with the particulars of that catastrophe.

I am far from meaning to insinuate, because I do not know that the person who persuaded Dr. T. to this fatal resource, derived the recipe immediately from Mr. Wesley's medical compilation. All I aver is, that ting up chance and fortune is our not being always able to discern and to trace the genuine causes of events: in consequence of which we blindly and absurdly feign to ourselves a supposed random, unreal, unsteady cause, called luck or contingency, whereas, were we endued with sufficient penetration to look into the hidden sources of things, we should not only see that there is no such power as contingency of fortune, but so far from it, that even the smallest and most trivial incidents are guided and governed by God's own express and special providence. If, therefore, the word chance have any determinate signification at all, it can mean neither more nor less than the unseen management of God. In which sense, the admirable Seneca makes use of the term: Fortune (says that philosopher), and Fate, and Nature, are but so many different names of the one true God, considered as exerting his power in various ways and manners." But, with Seneca's good leave, as the words fortune, chance, contingency, &c., have gradually opened a door to the grossest Atheism; and as they require much subtilty and prolixity of explanation, in order to their being understood in any other than an atheistical sense, it is more than expedient that the words themselves should be totally and finally cashiered and thrown aside.

I have only to add that if, in the succeeding Essay, any reader should imagine I express my meaning with too much plainness, it may suffice to observe, that there is no end to the capricious refinements of affected and excessive delicacy.

Quod verum, atque decens, curo, et rogo, et omnis in hoc sum.

Language, like animal bodies, may be physicked until it has no strength left. We may whet its edge, as the fool sharpened his knife, and as some are now for reforming the Church, until we have whetted the whole blade away.

Broad Hembury, Jan. 22, 1775.

CHAPTER I.

NECESSITY DEFINED: AND ITS CONSISTENCY WITH VOLUNTARY FREEDOM PROVED.

Aliquis in omnibus, nullus in singulis. The man who concerns himself in every thing bids fair not to make a figure in any thing.

Mr. John Wesley is precisely this aliquis in omnibus. For is there a single subject in which he has not endeavoured to shine?—He is also as precisely a nullus in singulis. For has he shone in any one subject which he ever attempted to handle?

Upon what principle can these two circumstances be accounted for? Only upon that very principle at which he so dolefully shakes his head: viz., the principle of necessity. The poor gentleman is necessarily an universal meddler: and as necessarily an universal miscarrier. Can he avoid being either the one or the other? No. "Why, then, do you animadvert upon him?"

1. Because I myself am as necessary an agent as he:—2. Because I love to "shoot folly as it flies:—3. Because as, on one hand, it is necessary that there should be heresies among men, 1 Cor. xi. 19; it is no less necessary, on the other, that those heresies should be dissected and exposed. Mr. Wesley imagines that, upon my own principles, I can be no more than "a clock." And if so, how can I help striking? He himself has several times smarted for coming too near the pendulum.

Mr. Wesley's incompetence to argument is never more glaringly conspicuous than when he paddles in metaphysics. And yet I suppose that the man who has modestly termed himself, and in print too, "The greatest minister in the world;" does, with equal certainty consider himself as the ablest metaphysician in the world. But his examinations are far too hasty and superficial to enter into the real merits of subjects so extremely abstruse, and whose concatenations are (though invincibly strong, yet) so exquisitely nice and delicate. One result of his thus exercising himself in matters which are too high for him is, that, in many cases, he decides peremptorily, without having discerned so much as the true state of the question; and then sets himself to speak evil of things which, it is very plain, he does not understand. Or (to borrow the language of Mr. Locke), he "knows a little, presumes a great deal, and so jumps to conclusions."

I appeal, at present, to his "Thoughts upon Necessity," thoughts which, though crude and dark as chaos, are announced, according to custom, with more than oracular positiveness: as though his own glandula pinealis was the single focus wherein all the rays of divine and human wisdom are concentrated.

His thoughts open thus:

1. "Is man a free-agent, or is he not?"—Without all manner of doubt, he is, in a vast number and variety of cases. Nor did I ever, in conversation, or in reading, meet with a person, or an author, who denied it.

But let us, by defining as we go, ascertain what free-agency is. All needless refinements apart, free-agency, in plain English, is neither more nor less than voluntary agency. Whatever the soul does, with the full bent of preference and desire, in that the soul acts freely. For ubi consensus, ibi voluntas, et ubi voluntas, ibi libertas.

I own myself very fond of definitions. I therefore premise what the Necessity is whose cause I have undertaken to plead.

It is exactly and diametrically opposite to that which Cicero delivers concerning fortuna, or chance, luck, hap, accidentality, and contingency; invented by the poets of second antiquity, and during many ages revered as a Deity, by both Greeks and Romans. "Quid est aliud sors, quid fortuna, quid casus, quid eventus; nisi quum sic aliquid cecidit, sic evasit, ut vel non cadere atque evenire, vel aliter cadere evenire, potuerit (f) ?" i. e. Chance, fortune, accident, and uncertain event, are then said to take place, when a thing so comes to pass as that it either might not have come to pass at all, or might have come to pass otherwise than it does.

On the contrary, I would define necessity to be that by which whatever comes to pass cannot but come pass (all circumstances taken into the account); and can come to pass in no other way or manner than it does. Which coincides with Aristotle's definition of necessity (though, by the way, he was a free-willer himself): Το μη ενδεχομενον ΑΛΛΩΣ εχειν, αναγκαιον φαρμεν (g): We call that necessary which cannot be otherwise than it is.

Hence the Greeks term necessity Αναγκη: because ανασσει it reigns, without exception, over all the works of God; and because ανασχει, it retains and comprises all things within the limits of its own dominion. The Romans called it neccesse et necessitas; quasi re cassitas, because it cannot fail, or be made void, et quasi ne quassitas, because it cannot be moved, or shaken, by all the power of men (h).

I acquiesce in the old distinction of necessity (a distinction adopted by Luther (i), and by most of, not to say by all, the sound reformed divines), into a necessity of compulsion, and a necessity of infallible certainty.—The necessity of compulsion is predicated of inanimate bodies; as we say of the earth (for instance) that it circuits the sun, by compulsory necessity: and, in some cases, of reasonable beings themselves; viz. when they are forced to do or suffer any thing, contrary to their will and choice.—The necessity of infallibly certainty is of a very different kind; and only renders the event inevitably future, without any compulsory force on the will of the agent. Thus, it was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ: he was therefore a necessary, though a voluntary, actor in that tremendous business.

2. "Are a man's actions free, or necessary?"—They may be, at one and the same time, free and necessary too. When Mr. Wesley is very hungry, or very tired, he is necessarily, and yet freely, disposed to food or rest. He can no more help being so disposed than a falling stone can help tending to the earth. But here lies the grand difference. The stone is a simple being, consisting of matter only: and consequently can have no will either to rise or fall.—Mr. Wesley is a compounded being, made up of matter and spirit. Consequently, his spirit, soul, or will (for I can conceive no real difference between the will and the soul itself) is concerned in sitting down to dinner, or in courting repose, when necessity impels to either. And I will venture to affirm, what he himself cannot deny, that, necessarily biassed as he is to those mediums of recruit, he has recourse to them as freely (i. e. as voluntarily, and with as much appetite choice, desire, and relish) as if necessity was quite out of the case; nay, and with abundantly greater freedom and choice, than if he was not so necessitated and impelled.

It would be easy to instance this obvious truth in a thousand particulars; and in particulars of infinitely greater moment than relate to common life. Let me just, en passant, illustrate the point, from the most grand important topic which the whole compass of reasoning affords.

It was necessary (i. e. absolutely and intrinsically inevitable), 1. That the Messiah should be invariably (h) holy in all his ways, and righteous in all his works:—2. That he should die for the sins of men.

Yet Christ, though, 1. necessarily good (so necessarily, that it was impossible for him to be otherwise), was freely and voluntarily

(f) Cic. De Divinat. L. 2.

(g) Apud Frommenium, Lib. 2. cap. 9.

(h) The immediate parent, or causa proxima, of necessity, is fate; called by the Greeks, επιρωμιση: because it invincibly distributes to every man his lot. They termed it also πεπωμιση, because it bounds, limits, marks out, adjusts, determines, and precisely ascertains, to each individual of the human race, his assigned portion both of active and passive life. Fate was likewise sometimes metonymically stiled μοιρα or the lot, i. e. the res ipsissima, or very actions and felicities and sufferings themselves, which fall to every man's share.

The Latins called fate, fatum: either from fiat, i. e. from God's saying, Let such and such a thing come to pass: or simply, a fando; from God's pronouncing the existence, the continuance, the circumstances, the times, and whatever else relates to men and things.

If we distinguish accurately, this seems to have been the order in which the most judicious of the ancients considered the whole matter. First, God:—then, his will:—then, fate; or the solemn ratification of his will, by passing and establishing it into an unchangeable decree:—then creation:—then, necessity; i. e. such an indissoluble concatenation of secondary causes and effects as has a native tendency to secure the certainty of all events, secut unda impellitur unda.—then, Providence; i. e. the omnipresent, omni-vigilant, all-directing superintendency of divine wisdom and power, carrying the whole pre-concerted scheme into actual execution, by the subservient mediation of second causes, which were created for that end.

(i) Vide Luther De Servo Arbitrio, Sect. 43.—Edit. Noremberg. 1526.

(k) I never knew more than one Arminian who was so tremendously consistent as to maintain, explicitly and in words, that it was possible for Christ himself to have fallen from grace by sin, and to have perished everlastingly. I must, however, do this gentleman the justice to add that he has, for some years past, been of a better judgment.—But the shocking principle itself is necessarily involved in, and invincibly follows upon the Arminian scheme of contingency; whether the assertors of that scheme openly avow the consequence or no.

good: else he could not have declared with truth, My meat and drink [i. e. my choice, my appetite, my desire] is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work b—
2. Though he (m) could not avoid being put to death as a sacrifice for sin, yet he died voluntarily, and therefore freely. Else he would not have affirmed that he was even straightened until it was accomplished (n): i. e. he wished and longed for the consummation of his obedience unto death.

Need I add any thing more to prove that freedom and necessity are not only compatible, but may even coalesce into absolute unisons with each other?

But "How do they thus coalesce?" — By the wise appointment of God, who is great in counsel and mighty in working. (o) A Christian will be satisfied with this answer, and philosophy itself cannot rise to an higher.

CHAP. II.

THE NECESSITY OF HUMAN VOLITIONS PROVED FROM THE NATURE OF THE CONNECTION SUBSISTING BETWEEN SOUL AND BODY.

MR. WESLEY asks, 3. "Is man self-determined acting; or is he determined by some other being?" — I scruple not to declare, as my steadfast judgment, that no man ever was, or ever will, or ever can be, strictly and philosophically speaking, self-determined to any one action, be that action what it may.

Let us examine this point. It is neither unimportant, nor unentertaining.

There is (p) no medium between matter and spirit. These two divide the whole universe between them. Even in man's present complex state, though body and soul constitute one compositum; yet are the two component principles not only distinct, but essentially different, from each other. Their connection, though astonishingly intimate, occasions no mixture nor confusion of this with that.

Notwithstanding which the nature (or, if you please, the law) of their junction is such that they reciprocally act upon each other. A man breaks a limb, or is wounded in a duel. The body, and the body alone receives the injury: but the injury is no sooner received than it operates upon the soul. For it is the soul only which feels pleasure or pain, through the medium of the bodily organs. Matter can no more feel, or perceive, than it can read, or pray. To suppose otherwise were to suppose that a violin can hear, and a telescope see.

If, therefore, the soul is the feeling principle, or sole seat of perception; it follows, as clear as day, that the soul is no less dependent on the body for a very considerable portion of its [i. e. of the soul's own] physical happiness or misery than the body is dependent on the soul, for its [i. e. for the body's] instrumental subserviency to the will. Consequently, the soul is (not self-determined, but) necessarily determined, to take as much care of the body as it [the soul] in its present views deems requisite: because the soul is conscious of its dependence on that machine, as the inlet and channel of pleasing or of disagreeable sensations. So that, in this very exteensive instance, man's volitions are swayed, this way or that, to the right hand or to the left; by considerations drawn from the circumstance of that necessary dependence on the body which the soul cannot possibly raise itself superior to, while the mutual connection subsists.

An idea is that image, form, or conception of any thing, which the soul is impressed with from without. (q) How come we by these ideas? I believe them to be all, originally, let in through the bodily senses only. I cannot consider reflection as, properly, the source of any new ideas: but rather as a sort of mental chemistry, by which the understanding contemplatively analyses and sublimates, into abstract and refined knowledge, some of those ideas which result either from experience, or from information, and which were primarily admitted through the avenues of sense. Without the sense of hearing, we could have had no just idea of sound: nor of odours, without the sense of smelling, any more than the foot can taste, or the hand can hear.

The senses themselves, which are thus the only doors by which ideas, i. e. the rudiments of all (r) knowledge, find their way to the soul; are literally, and in the fullest

(i) John iv. 34.

(m) To deny the necessity of Christ's sufferings, i. e. to consider them as unpredestinated, and as things which might, or might not, have happened, is to annihilate, at one stroke, the whole dignity and importance of the Christian religion. Scripture is therefore extremely careful to inculcate, again and again, in the strongest and most explicit terms which language can supply that the whole of Christ's humiliation, even his death itself, was infallibly and inevitably decreed. See, among many other passages, those which occur in the 5th chapter of this Essay.

(n) Luke xii. 50.

(o) Jer. xxii. 19.

(p) I am obliged here to take these two particulars for granted: as the adhibition of the abundant proofs by which they are supported and evinced would lead me too far from the object immediately in view.

(q) Are not the powers of fancy an exception to the doctrine which maintains that all ideas originally accede, ab extra, to the mind? — Not in the least. Though I may form (for instance) an uncertain, or a best an incomplete, idea of a person I never saw; yet that idea is either drawn from description, or, if purely imaginary, is a combination of conceptions, every one of which came at first into the mind through the senses, and which it associates on principles of real or supposed similitude.

(r) The reader will observe, that I am here speaking of no other than of natural and artificial knowledge. Spiritual knowledge, divinely impressed on the soul in its regeneration by the Holy Ghost, comes not, hitherto, within the compass of the present dis-import of the word, corporeal. Hence the soul cannot see, if the eyes are destroyed; nor feel, if the nervous functions are suspended; nor hear, if the organs of that sense are totally impaired. What learn we from this? That the soul, or mind, is primarily and immediately indebted to the body, for all the ideas (and consequently for all the knowledge) with which it is furnished. By these ideas, when compared, combined, or separated, the soul, on every occasion, necessarily regulates its conduct; and is afterwards as dependant on the body for carrying its conceptions into outward act, as it was for its simple reception of them at first.

Thus the soul is, in a very extensive degree, passive as matter itself.

Whether the fibres of the brain do no more than simply vibrate, or whether they be also the canals of a vital fluid agitated and set in circulation, by the percussions which it receives from the senses, the argument comes to just the same point. The senses are necessarily impressed by every object from without, and as necessarily commove the fibres of the brain: from which nervous commotion ideas are necessarily communicated to, or excited in, the soul, and by the judgment which the soul necessarily frames of those ideas, the will is necessarily inclined to approve or disapprove, to act or not to act. If so, where is the boasted power of self-determination?

Having taken a momentary survey of the soul's dependance on the body, and of the vast command which the body has over the soul (so great, that a disease may quickly degrade a philosopher into an idiot; and even an alteration of the weather diffuse a temporary stupor through all the powers of quition. Though to me it seems extremely probable that this most adorable agent often condescends to make the senses themselves (and especially the sense of feeling; to which single sense, by the way, all the other four may, sub diverso modo, be reduced) the inlets of his blessed influence. There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding. Job xxiii. 8.

(s) Lord Chesterfield's remark is not ill founded. "I am convinced that a light supper, a good night's sleep, and a fine morning, have sometimes made a hero of the same man who, by an indigestion, a restless night, and a rainy morning, would have been a coward." Letter 117.—Again: "Those who see and observe kings, heroes, and statesmen, discover that they have head aches, indigestions, humours, and passions, just like other people: every one of which, in their turns, determine their wills in defiance of their reason." Letter 173. Human excellence truly has much to be proud of! and man is a sovereign, self-determining animal! an animal whom too rarified or too vicious a texture, too rapid or too languid a circulation of blood; an imperfect secretion of spirits from the blood, through the cortical strainers of the brain; or an irregular distribution of the spiritous fluid, from the secreting fibres to the nervous canals which diffuse themselves through the body:—these and a thousand other involuntary causes can at any time, in less than a moment, if God please, suspend every one of our sensations; stagnate us into stupidity; agitate us into a fever; or deprive us of life itself!

Yet let it be observed that thought and reason are, at all times and amidst all circumstances whatever, essentially inseparable from the soul: whether it dwell in a well organized and duly tempered body, or in a body whose construction is ever so unfavourable, and whose mechanic balance is ever so broken and impaired. But in the latter case (especially in swoons, epilepsies, &c.) the soul cannot unfold and exercise its faculties, as when the material machine is in right order. Thus we cannot say, with metaphysical propriety, that a person in a fainting fit, or that even the most absolute idiot on earth, is an irrational being: but only that he has not the service of his reason. Nor can we say of a madman that he has lost his understanding: but only that the proper use or direction of it is perverted.

It is true, indeed, that, asidioty seems to be rather a quid deficiens than a τὸ positivum, and may therefore be immediately occasioned by the bad mechanism (i. e. by a vitiated arrangement and motion) of the corporeal particles, whether fluid or solid:—So, on the other hand, madness seems to have more in it of the τὸ positivum; and, consequently, to be the effect of an higher and more absolute cause. What can that cause be? I am strongly and clearly of opinion, with Mr Baxter (no Baxter the pious man, but Baxter the great modern philosopher, that all madness whatever proceeds from the powerful and continued agency of some separate spirit, or spirits, obtruding phantastic visions on the soul of the insane person. If the majority of dreams are but the madness of sleep, what is madness, properly so called, but a waking dream? For, as that most accomplished metaphysician very justly reasons, "The soul in itself is an uncompounded, simple substance, and hath no part, and therefore properly no constitution: neither is it liable to any change, or alteration, in its own nature. The inert matter of the body could never affect it thus (i. e. could never so affect the soul as to occasion madness). That could only limit the faculties of the soul, farther and farther, or deaden its activity: but not animate it after such a terrible manner. Hence there is no other way for its being affected in this manner, but the cause I have already assigned.—There is indeed a great difference and variety in the phenomena of reason disturbed. But universally the disease could not be lodged in the soul itself: nor could the matter of the body affect it any other way than by deadening (i. e. by impeding) its activity; which, I think, is never the case in these appearances. In short, the disorder of matter might make a man a stupid idiot; subject him to sleep, apoplexy, or any thing approaching to its own nature: but could never be the cause of rage, distraction, phrensy, unless it were employed as an instrument by some other cause: that is, it cannot of itself be the cause of these disorders of reason. If the inertia of matter infers any thing, it infers thus much." Baxter's Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul. vol. ii. p. 141, 142.—I no more doubt that mad persons, at this very day, are demoniacs, or influenced and agitated by incorporeal and invisible beings, than I can doubt that some people were so possessed, at the time of our Lord's abode on earth. Such an assertion will, probably, sound romantically strange to a prejudiced and to a superficial ear. But (let the fact itself really stand how it may) I think I can venture to pronounce that the philosophy of opinion, as stated and argued by Mr. Baxter, is irrefragable.—Examine first, and then judge.

Unembodied spirits, both friendly and hostile (εὐδαίμονες et κακοδαίμονες), holy and unholy, have more to do with us in a way both of good and evil than the generality of us seem to imagine. But they themselves are all no more than parts of that great chain which depends on the first cause, or uncreated link; and can only act as ministers of his will.

Luther relates several uncommon things concerning his own converse with some of the spiritual world; which, however fanciful they may, prima facie, appear, are by no means philosophically inadmissible. For, so saying, I am sure to incur a smile of contempt from perlings and materialists; the former of whom swear when they do not reason:

the mind), let us next enquire, on what the body itself depends, for the sources of those innumerable ideas, which it is the vehicle of transmitting to the intellects; and without which transmission, the intellect, implunged in a mass of clay, could have no more idea of outward things than an oyster has of a tinder-box. An unactive consciousness of mere torpid existence would have been the whole amount of its riches, during its inclosure in a prison without door, window, or crevice.

The human body is necessarily encompassed by a multitude of other bodies; which other surrounding bodies (animal, vegetable, &c.) so far as we come within their perceivable sphere, necessarily impress our nerves with sensations correspondent to the objects themselves. These sensations are necessarily (and, for the most part, instantaneously), propagated to the soul; which can no more help receiving them, and being affected by them, than a tree can resist a stroke of lightning.

Now, (1) if all the ideas in the soul derive their existence from sensation; and (2) if the soul depend absolutely on the body, for all those sensations; and (3) if the body be both primarily and continually dependent on other extrinsic beings, for the very sensations which it [the body] communicates to the soul;—the consequence seems, to me, undeniable: that neither the immanent nor the transient acts of man (i. e. neither his mental nor his outward operations) are self-determined; but, on the contrary, determined by the views with which an infinity of surrounding objects necessarily, and almost incessantly, impress his intellect.

And on what do those surrounding objects themselves, which are mostly material (i. e. on what does matter, in all its forms, positions, and relations), depend? Certainly not on itself. It could neither be its own creator, nor can it be its own conservator. In my idea, every particle of matter would immediately revert into non-existence, if not retained in being, from moment to moment, by the will of Him who upholds all things by the word of his power, (t) and through whom all things consist. (u)

Much less does matter depend on the human mind. Man can neither create nor exterminate (x) a single atom. There are cases wherein he can alter the modes of matter: so as to form (for instance) certain vegetable fibres into linen, linen into paper, and paper into books. He can also throw that linen, or paper, or books, into a fire; and thereby dissolve the present connection of their particles, and annihilate their modal relations. But notwithstanding he has all this in his power (though, by the way, he will never do either one or the other, except his will be necessarily determined by some effectual motive), still the seeming destruction amounts to no more than a variation. Not an individual particle of the burnt matter is exterminated; nor even its essential relation to the universe superseded. There would be precisely the same quantity of solid substance which there now is, without the loss of a corpuscular unit, were all the men and things upon the face of the earth, and the very globe itself, reduced to ashes. Consequently, matter is absolutely and solely dependent on God himself.

Thus have we briefly traced the winding current to its source. The soul, or intellect, depends on its ideas for the determinations of its volitions: else it would will, as a blind man walks, at a venture and in the dark. Those ideas are the daughters of sensation; and can deduce their pedigree from no other quarter. The embodied soul could have had no idea of so much as a tree, or a blade of grass, if our distance from those bodies had been such as to have precluded their respective forms from occurring to the eye. The senses, therefore, are the channels of all our natural perceptions. Which senses are entirely corporeal: as is the brain and wisely consider a grin, and a syllogism, as two names for the same thing. When it can be solidly proved that the gums are the seat of intellect, I will then allow that a laugher shews his understanding and his wit every time he shews his teeth. Was ridicule the legitimate test of truth, there could be no such thing as truth in the world; and consequently there would be nothing for ridicule to be the test of: as every truth may be, and in its turn actually has been, ridiculed, by some insipid witting or other. So that, to borrow a lively remark from Mr. Hervey, "The whim of making ridicule the test of truth seems as suitable to the fitness of things as to place harlequin in the seat of lord chief justice." Moreover ridicule itself, viewed as ridiculously usurping the office of a philosophical touchstone, has been ridiculed, with much poignancy, and strength of sense, by the ingenious pen of the late Dr. Brown, in his Essay on Satire:

---

"Come, let us join awhile this titt'ring crew,
And own, the idiot guide for once is true:
Deride our weak forefathers' rusty rule,
Who therefore smiled, because they saw a fool.
Sublime: logic now adorns our isle:

---

We therefore see a fool, because we smile?

Truth in her gloomy cave why fondly seek?

Lo, gay she sits in laughter's dimple cheek:

Contentus each surly academic foe,

And courts the spruce free-thinker and the beau.

No more shall reason boast her pow'r divine:

Her base eternal shook by folly's mine.

Truth's sacred fort' exploded laugh shall win;

And coxcombs vanquish Berkeley by a grin!"

(f) Heb. i. 3.

(u) Col. i. 17.

(x) To all other anti-philosophical absurdities, Arminianism adds the supposed defectibility of saving grace; by giving as her opinion that the holy principle in a renewed soul is not only a corruptible and perishable seed, but that it frequently and actually does suffer a total extinction and a final annihilation. Or, as Mr. Wesley with his fraternity vulgarly express it, "He who is, to-day, a child of God, may be, to-morrow, a child of the devil." As if the principle of grace were less privileged than a particle of matter! And as if man, who cannot annihilate a single atom, were able to annihilate the most illustrious effect of the Holy Spirit's operation! Credit Judæus, &c.

also, that grand centre to which all their impressions are forwarded, and whence they immediately act upon the immaterial principle. These corporeal senses receive their impressions from the presence, or impulse, of exterior beings (for all our sensations are but modes of motion).—And every one of those exterior beings is dependant for existence and for operation on God Most High.

Such is the progression of one argument (and it is but one among many) for the great doctrine of philosophical necessity: a chain concerning which (and, especially, concerning the determination to action, by motives arising from ideas) Mr. Wesley modestly affirms, that “It has not one good link belonging to it.” Seriously, I pity the size of his understanding. And I pity it, because I verily believe it to be a fault which he cannot help; any more than a dwarf can help not being six feet high. Lame indeed are all his commentations:

“But better he’d give us, if better he had.”

I shall close this chapter with submitting a few plain and reasonable queries to the reader.

1. How is that supposition which ascribes a self-determining will to a created spirit, less absurd than that supposition which ascribes self-existence to matter?

2. In what respect, or respects, is the Arminian supposition of a fortuitous train of events less atheistical than the epicurean supposition of a fortuitous concourse of atoms?

3. If man be a self-determining agent, will it not necessarily follow there are as many first causes (i. e. in other words, as many gods) as there are men in the world?

4. Is not independence essentially requisite to self-determination?

5. But is it true in fact, and would it be sound philosophy to admit, that man is an independent being?

6. Moreover, is the supposition, of human independence and self-determination sound theology? At least does it comport with the Scriptural account of man? For a specimen of which account only cast your eye on the passage or two that follow.—The way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his own steps. Jer. x. 23.—Without me [i. e. without Christ] ye can do nothing; John xv. 5.—In him [i. e. in God] we live, and are moved (κινεμεθα), and have our existence; Acts xvii. 28.—It is he who worketh all in all; I Cor. xii. 6.—It is God who worketh in you both to will and to do; Phil. ii. 13.—Of him, and to him, and through him are all things; Rom. xi. 36.

7. May we not, or the whole, soberly affirm that the scheme of necessity is philosophy in her right mind? And that the scheme of contingency is philosophy run mad?

CHAP. III.

SEVERAL OBJECTIONS TO THE SCHEME OF NECESSITY ANSWERED

It seems most agreeable to the radical simplicity which God has observed in his works to suppose that, in themselves, all human souls are equal. I can easily believe that the soul of an oysterwoman has naturally the (unexpanded) powers of Grotius, or of Sir Isaac Newton: and that which conduces to raise the philosopher, the poet, the politician, or the linguist so much above the ignorant and stupid of mankind, is not only the circumstance of intellectual cultivation, but (still more than that) his having the happiness to occupy a better house, i. e. a body more commodiously organized, than they.

The soul of a monthly reviewer, if imprisoned within the same mud walls which are tenanted by the soul of Mr. John Wesley, would, similarly circumstanced, reason and act (I verily think) exactly like the bishop of Moorfields. And I know some very sensible people who even go so far as to suppose that, was a human spirit shut up in the skull of a cat, puss would notwithstanding move prone on all four, pur when stroked, spit when pinched, and birds and mice be her darling objects of pursuit.

Now though I can, by no means, for my own part, carry matters to so extreme a length as this, yet I repeat my opinion, that much, very much, depends on corporeal organization. Whence the usual remark that a man is (I would rather say, appears to be) sensible and ingenious, according to his dimension and solid content of brain. That is, as I apprehend, the soul is more capable of exerting its powers, when lodged in a capacious and well-constructed vehicle. I dare believe that the brain of Dr. Thomas Nowell is, to that of Mr. John Wesley, as two to one, at the very least. And yet all this is the result of absolute necessity. For what is brain but matter peculiarly modified? And who is the modifier? Not man, but God.

I just now hinted the conjecture of some that a human spirit, incarcerated in the brain of a cat, would probably both think and behave as that animal now does. But how would the soul (y) of a cat acquit itself,

(y) Let not the reader start, at that expression, “The soul of a cat.” For though the word, so applied, may seem strange to those who have not weighed both sides of the question (it would have seemed very strange to me, about fifteen years ago), yet, on giving the cause an impartial hearing, the

if inclosed in the brain of a man? We cannot resolve this question, with certainty, any more than the other. We may, however, even on this occasion, address every one of our human brethren in those words of that great philosophic necessitarian, St. Paul: and ask, who maketh thee to differ from the lowest of the brute creation? Thy Maker's free-will, not thine. And what pre-eminence hast thou, which thou didst not receive from him? Not the least, nor the shadow of any. —Now, if thou didst [not acquire, but] receive it as a distinguishing gift of his free and sovereign pleasure, why carriest thou thyself proudly (καυχασαι), as though thou hadst not received it; 1 Cor. iv. 7.

“He, who through vast immensity can pierce;
See worlds on worlds compose one universe;
Can tell how system beyond system runs;
What other planets circle other suns;
What vary'd being peoples e'ry star;
May tell, why Heav'n has made us as we are.”

What the poet could not tell, the Bible does: —“Why are we made as we are?” Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight. Which is answer enough to satisfy me.

I take the truth of the matter to be this: All the intellectual distinctions which obtain throughout the whole scale of animated existence, from the brightest angel down to man, and which give advantage to one man above another; which intellectual distinctions descend, likewise, in just gradations, from man to the minutest animalcule; are distributed, to each individual, in number, in measure, and in weight. Wisdom xi. 20, by the sovereign will and the unerring hand of God the only wise. The uses to which those intellectual powers shall subserve; the term of their duration; and, in short, every circumstance relative both to them and their possessors; I consider as falling under the regulation of God's determining and permissive decree before time, and of his ever-present and ever-acting providence in time.

According to this scheme of things (a scheme which, when fairly weighed, will be found the most cheerful to men, and the most worthy of God, which was ever proposed to the human mind), that melancholy, that absurd, that atheistical fiction, whose name is Chance, has nothing to do with God or with his works. On the contrary, the golden chain of necessity, providence, or fate (it is no matter which you term it), is let down, from the throne of the supreme through all the ranks of animated and of unanimated creation: guiding and governing every individual spirit, and every individual atom, by such means, and in such a manner, as best comport with the dignity, the efficacy, the wisdom, and the love, of him who holds the chain, and who has implicated every link.

Thus, he doth according to his will, in the armies of the heaven; and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou (z)? Hence it is, that the (a) very hairs of our heads are all numbered in his book; and not one of them can fall from its pore, without the leave of Heaven. He is the guardian of sparrows; and will not let what we account the meanest insect expire, until the point of time, divinely destined, is come. He not only tells the number of the (b) stars, and calls them each by name; but notices and directs the very particles of (c) dust, which float in the atmosphere. The (d) sun shines not, but at his command; nor can a (e) wind blow but by authority from him. May we not say of necessity, what the Psalmist says of the central luminary round which our globe is wheeled; that there is nothing hid from the heat thereof?

And yet there are those who think that necessity makes no part of the Christian system!

Mr. Wesley is, or pretends to be, of that number. Let us give a concise hearing to the difficulties which, in his estimation, clog the scheme of evangelical and philosophical fate: though they are such as have been refuted again and again.

1. “There can be no moral good, or evil; no virtue, and no vice.”

So thought (f) Aristotle; and his disciples, the Peripatetics. Hence they defined moral virtue to be an elective habit, flowing originally from free-will, and rendered easy by repeated acts.

It is no wonder that proud heathens should thus err, seeing they know not the Scriptures, nor the power of God. But Mr. Wesley should remember that he has read, and professes to believe, a book which tells him that a man can receive nothing except scale of evidence will, in my judgment, strongly decide for an immaterial principle in brutes.

I mean not here to discuss the argument. But let me hint, that one principle hinge on which the enquiry turns, is: Do those inferior beings reason, or do they not? If they do (be it in ever so small a degree) they must consist of something more than body; i. e. they must be compounded of matter and spirit. —If they do not reason at all (and we may as well doubt whether they can feel at all), we may set them down for mere material machines.

—He, however, who seriously thinks, that even birds, or insects, are watches, may, with equal ease, while his hand is in, advance a few steps higher, and suppose that men are clocks, i. e. larger watches of the three.

(z) Dan iv. 35. (a) Matt. x. 29, 30.

(b) Psa. cxlvii. 4. (c) Isa. xl. 12.

(d) Job ix. 7. (e) Psa. cxxx. 7.

(f) And yet Aristotle, though a vehement, was not (any more than his disciple at the Foundry) a consistent, free-will man. Hence Aristotle being asked, “Who can keep a secret?” made this odd answer: “He that can hold red hot coals in his mouth. —Surely, Free-will must be very feeble, and Necessity irresistibly potent, upon this principle! Not to ask: If Free-will cannot, on a proper occasion, shut the mouth of the man that has it, how can it bring him virtue, and save his soul?”

It be given him from heaven; (g) that we cannot even think a good thought (h) unless God breathe it into our hearts; and that it is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ who must work in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight. (i)

Nor should his lordship of Moorfields forget that he has solemnly subscribed (to omit all present mention of articles and homilies) a certain liturgy; in which liturgy, among a thousand other passages equally excellent, God himself is addressed as the sole being from whom all holy desires, all good counsels [or sincerely devout intentions], and all just works, do proceed. The supreme is, likewise, in the same "Calvinistical and Antinomian Prayer-book" declared to be the almighty and everlasting God, who maketh us both to will and to do those things that be good and acceptable to his divine majesty. And in absolute harmony with this necessitating principle, the said book beseeches the blessed Father and governor of men, that by his holy inspiration we may think those things that are good; and that we may, by his merciful guidance, faithfully perform the same. If this is being what Mr. Wesley terms, "a fine piece of clock-work;" I heartily wish and pray that I may, every hour of my life, be so wound up.

But still, the objector, "moral good, or evil, cannot (k) consist with necessity. I, on the contrary, say that it both can and does. Mr. Wesley does not consider the tremendous consequences which unavoidably flow from his position. For, if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy; it will follow that God himself (who, without all doubt, is necessarily and unchangeably good) is an immoral being, and not praiseworthy for his goodness! On the same horrible Arminian principle it would also follow, that Christ's most perfect obedience (which was necessary: for he could not but obey perfectly) had no morality in it, was totally void of merit, and entitled him to neither praise nor reward! The axiom, therefore, which dares to affirm that "necessity and moral agency are irreconcilable things;" lays, at once, the axe to the root both of natural and revealed religion, and ought to be hissed back again by all mankind to the hell whence it came.

The crucifiers of the Son of God perpetrated the most immoral act that ever was, or ever will be, committed. And yet, I am expressly assured, by the written testimony of the Holy Ghost, entered on a record which will continue to the end of time, that Herod, and Pontius Pilate, and the people of the Jews, were gathered together against Jesus, for to do whatsoever God's hand and God's counsel had fore-determined to be done. (l) So that, upon Christian principles at least, necessity and moral evil (by the same rule, also, necessity and moral good) may walk (m) hand in hand together. If Mr. Wesley prefers Aristotle and the other gentlemen of the Lycæum to the inspired writers, and chooses the peripatetic scheme of free-will rather than the Bible scheme of necessity; he must, for me, go on to hug an idol that cannot save.

The whole cavil amounts to precisely this. If God is the alone author and worker of all good, virtue ceases to be virtue; and, if God is the permittor of evil, vice ceases to be vice. Can any thing be, at once, more impious and more irrational, than the letter and the spirit of those two propositions?

In one word: those modes of actions called virtue and vice do not cease to be moral, i. e. to affect our manners; as creatures of God and as members of society, be those modes occasioned by what they may. Acts of devotion, candour, justice, and beneficence, together with their opposites, are, to all intents and purposes, as morally good or evil if they flow from one source as from another; though no works can be evangelically good and pleasing to God which do not spring from his own grace in the heart. But this latter circumstance is entirely of spiritual consideration. It has nothing to do, off or on, with the mere (n) morality of actions. Good is morally, i. e. religiously excellent, or socially beneficial, and evil is morally, i. e. religiously bad, or socially injurious, whether men be self-determining agents or not. Light is light, and darkness is darkness, flow they from the right hand or from the left.

2. We are told that, on the hypothesis of necessity, man is "neither rewardable nor punishable; neither praise nor blameworthy."

No objection can be more unphilosophical than this, because it quite loses sight of the very point in debate; viz. of necessity of liberty ever ascribed to the advocates for moral necessity."

Dr. Priestly's Exam. of Beattie, &c. p. 178.

(l) Acts ii. 23. and iv. 28.

(m) I have largely canvassed this point in a former tract, entitled, "More Work for Mr. John Wesley."

(n) Morality is, I think, usually, and very justly, defined to be that relation, or proportion, which actions bear to a given rule.—Consequently, neither necessity, nor non-necessity, has any thing to do with the morality of action.

(g) John iii. 27. (h) 2 Cor. iii. 5. (i) Heb. xiii. 21. (k) "The hacknied objection to the doctrine of necessity, from its being [pretendedly] inconsistent with the idea of virtue and vice, as implying praise and blame, may be fully retorted upon its opponents. For, as to their boasted self-determining power (were the thing possible in itself, and did not imply an absurdity) by which they pretended to have a power of acting independently of every thing that comes under the description of motive; I scruple not to say, that it is as foreign to every idea of virtue or vice, praise or blame, as the grossest kind of mechanism, that the most chattering writer in existence itself by which certain causes inevitably produce certain effects, and certain antecedents are inevitably concatenated with certain consequences. It is sufficient, therefore, to answer: that the will of God has established a natural connection between virtue and (o) happiness, vice and misery. This divine established connection is so indissoluble that, even in the present state of things, happiness never fails to enter at the same door with virtue; nor does misery ever fail to tread upon the heels of vice.

Some sensualists, however, profess otherwise; and affirm that their own deviations from the moral path are neither attended, nor followed, by any pungent briar, or grieving thorn. Their draughts are all balmy and nectarious, without a drop of wormwood or of gall, to allay the sweetness, or to embitter the remembrance.

Those gentlemen must, however, excuse me from taking their word for this. I do not believe one syllable of it to be true. Both Scripture, and the nature of the case, and the observations I have made, unite to render me quite positive that the way of transgressors is hard, Prov. xiii. 15.: that even in the midst of laughter they have a tinge of sorrow in their hearts, as well as that the end of their mirth is heaviness, Prov. xiv. 13. They may, for a time, like the Lacedæmonian boy, conceal the wolf that is eating out their very entrails; and set the gloss of an outward Sardonian smile, on the inward pangs they endure; but the great law of necessity, from which neither the virtuous nor the licentious are exempt, assures me that this pretended ease is mere dissimulation and grimace.

One of the most sensible men I ever knew, but whose life, as well as creed, had been rather eccentric, returned me the following answer not many months before his death, when I asked him, "Whether his former irregularities were not both accompanied at the time, and succeeded afterwards by some sense of mental pain?" Yes, said he; but I have scarce ever owned it until now. We [meaning, we infidels, and men of fashionable morals] do not tell you all that passes in our hearts.

The fact, then, plainly is, that rectitude of manners saves people from much uneasiness of mind; and that the perpetration of moral evil involves in it a Trojan horse, whose hidden force puts their comforts to the sword. I have seen instances of this in very high, as well as in more humble, life: notwithstanding all the labour and art which have been obtained to veil it from the eye of man. They who plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same, Job iv. 8: the crop is always, more or less, similar to the seed. The wicked man travelleth with pain all his days; and a dreadful sound is in his ears, Job xv. 20, 21; let him say what he will to the contrary. So that we may almost assert, with (p) Seneca, "prima et maxima peccantium pœna est, peccasse." i. e. the very commission of sin is its own primary and capital punishment.

God himself has joined the chain together: no wonder, therefore, that its links cannot be put asunder. Hence I conclude that, let what seeming consequences soever flow from the position of necessity, God would have tied moral and natural evil together into one knot, if moral evil were not justly punishable. And while facts, indisputable facts, say, Aye; facts I will still believe, though ten thousand imaginary inferences were to say, No.

I must likewise add that, if we shut out the doctrine of necessity, which asserts the inseparable connection of moral evil with intellectual (and, often, with external) infelicity; men will want one of the most rational motives (q) which can possibly induce them to a hatred of vice. And so great is the deprivation of human nature that, were it not for the thing necessity, virtue neither would nor could have any sort of existence in the world.

As for that mixture (or rather intersper-

(o) I here speak of intellectual happiness or misery.

(p) Epist. Lib. 16. Ep. 2.—When St. Paul speaks (Eph. iv. 19.) of some who were ἀνελθόντες, which we render, past feeling (though it may better be rendered, quite sunk in indolence and idleness; totally enervated, and dissipated, enemies to all honest, manly, and laborious employ), there is no necessity for supposing even the English phrase to import, that those wretched people were void of inward horror and tormenting anguish; but that they were quite void of outward decency, and had no feelings of delicacy: for there is a sort of refinement (though bad is the best) which even vice itself is capable of.

When the same apostle speaks, elsewhere (1 Tim. iv. 2.) of the κενυθησάμενων, or persons whose consciences have been seared as with a hot iron; the word (not to canvass here the several critical senses which it will admit of) may be fairly considered as importing neither more nor less than this, that they carry a fearful brand, or mark of condemnation, in their own minds; though they may endeavour to toss off matters, outwardly, with an air of seeming unconcern.

(q) Should any be so pitifully undiscerning as to ask, "What can necessity have to do with rational motives?"—I answer, That there are numberless cases wherein certain motives appear so very rational to the mind as to be absolutely cogent, and incline the will effectually. For the finally predominant motive constantly and infallibly determines the will, and the will thus necessarily determined as constantly and infallibly (all extrinsic impediments removed) determines the actions of the willer. Non est intelligentis causæ, sine fine sibi proposito agere.

If motives did not so operate on the mind, and if the mind, so operated upon, did not give the law to the will, and if the will, so biased and conciliated, did not (positis omnibus ponendis) necessarily influence the conduct, actions and volitions would be uncaused effects: than which ideas it is impossible for any thing to be more absurd and self-contradictory.

sion) of good and evil which obtains throughout our sublunary planet; this likewise I acknowledge to be the consequence of actual and reigning necessity. But this, in a philosophic eye, reflects no more blame on necessity itself, than the two contrary powers of attraction and repulsion can reflect dishonour on the wisdom of him who, for good reasons, endued matter with those opposite properties.

Cousin german to the second, is Mr. Wesley's

3rd Objection: namely, that if universal necessity determine all the thoughts and actions of man, "there can be no judgment to come;" i. e. God cannot, in the last day, judge and sentence mankind according to their works. I have (r) elsewhere amply refuted this empty cavil. But, as it is now hashed and served up again in a different dish, I will give it another examination, before we dismiss it from the table.

The objector forgets one main circumstance of no small importance to the argument; viz. that the judgment-day itself, and the whole process of the grand transaction, together with every thing that relates to it, directly or indirectly; are, upon the Christian scheme, no less necessary and inevitable, than any intermediate event can be. An oak is not more the daughter of an acorn, than absolute necessity will be the mother of that universal audit wherewith she is already pregnant.

But observe: the scriptural is not a blind necessity, or a necessity resulting (as some of the grosser Stoics believed) either from the planetary positions, or from the "stubbornness of matter." I no where contend for these kinds of necessity; which, even admitting them to have their respective degrees of physical influence, in subordination to providence; still can never by any Christian (nor, I should think, by any man of refined understanding) be considered as exercising the least dominion over God himself, by inferring any sort of casualty on his interior purposes, or extrinsic operations.

On the contrary, necessity in general, with all its extensive series of adamantine links in particular, is in reality what the poets feigned of Minerva, the issue of divine wisdom; deriving its whole existence from the free-will of God, and its whole effectuality from his never-ceasing providence.

(r) More Work for Mr. John Wesley.

(s) See p. 173, of a performance already quoted, namely, Dr. Priestley's masterly "Examination of Dr. Reid's Inquiry into the human mind, Dr. Beattie's Essay on Truth, and Dr. Oswald's Appeal to Common Sense."—I cannot help observing, what, by this time, almost every person knows, and every impartial judge must acknowledge; viz. the energy and success with which Dr. Priestley has battered the free-will lanterns (the Inquiry, the Appeal, and the Essay), in which the three northern lights had respectively stuck themselves and hung themselves

Thus I affirm the day of judgment to be necessary; to wit, because God has absolutely appointed it, Acts xvii. 31. For his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure, Isa. xlvi. 10. It is also necessary that there should be conscious beings on whom to pass sentence; and there should be both good and evil actions, on which the sentence of the judge should turn. We must, I think, admit this; or at one stroke deny the certain futurity of a judgment-day. And for my own part I would much rather believe and maintain so important an article of revealed religion, though upon the principle of necessity, than I would virtually deny it, as an Arminian, by imagining either the great day itself, or the decisions of the day, to be things of unfixed chance, lying at sixes and sevens, and which, consequently, may or may not take effect at all.

It is the doctrine of uncertain self-determination which, by representing events to lie at hap-hazard, stamps absurdity on the sure expectation of a judgment to come. It is the doctrine of absolute necessity alone which, by refusing to hang any one circumstance on a peradventure, affixes the seal of infallible futurity to the day itself, to the business of the day, and to all the antecedents, concomitants, and consequences of the whole.

That side-face of Arminian free-will which we have hitherto surveyed, carries no more than a squinting aspect on the day of ultimate retribution, by only leaving the day and its retributions at the uncertain mercy of a may-be. Look at the other profile (i. e. view the blind side) of the Arminian goddess, and you will immediately perceive that, according to her scheme of metaphysics, it is utterly impossible there should be any day of judgment at all. For,

He alone can be called "a self-determining agent" who is quite independent on any other agent or agency whatever. If I may depend, for my being, for my ideas, and for my operations on another; my being, and ideas, and operations are and must be influenced and affected by that dependance. Consequently, I am neither self-existent (s) nor self-determined. But, if I am an independent animal, I am also, necessarily, (t) self-existent: and I not only may be, but absolutely must be (view what side of the argument we will, necessity stares us in the out to public view. It lay peculiarly in Dr. Priestley's department to examine the theory of those new lights and colours. And he has done it to purpose. Though I am apt to think that the luminous triumvirate, like Æsop's one-eyed stag, received the mortal shot from a quarter whence they least expected it.

(z) An independent creature is a contradiction in terms. To ask, "Whether the Deity might not endue created beings with philosophical independence?" is to ask whether one God might not make millions of others. I answer, No. And yet I do not, face!) I absolutely must be a self-determinant. Thus self-existence and independence necessarily enter into the basis of self-determination, i. e. of Arminian or Methodistical free-will.

Let us for a moment imagine ourselves to be what Mr. Wesley supposes us.

Lord of myself is essentially connected with accountable to none. Farewell then to the very possibility of a judgment-day. Shall an independent being, who can have no superior, hold up his hand as a felon at the bar? Shall a potent self-exister deign to be punished for the evanid crimes of an hour? Shall a sovereign self-determiner submit to receive sentence from the lips of another? Impossible. Paul was a knave for asserting it. And Felix was a fool for trembling at the empty sound.

What a truly Christian tenet therefore is that of free-will! How patly it squares with the Bible! and with how good a grace does orthodox Mr. John introduce his 4th Objection, that "the Scriptures cannot be of divine original," if the doctrine of necessity be true.

I, à contra, scruple not to declare that no man can consistently acknowledge the "divine authority of the Scriptures" without believing their contents: i. e. without being an absolute necessitarian. I will even add, that all the intentional defenders of Christianity in the world, who encounter Deism, or Atheism itself, or any but necessitarian principles; such defenders ever will, and inevitably must have the worst end of the staff: for the Bible will stand on no ground but its own; nor can the cavillings of its doctrinal gainsayers (flimsy as their cavillings are) be hewn effectually in pieces, by any weapons but those which the Bible itself supplies. Among others, it supplies us with the invincible two-edged sword of predestination and necessity (which two edges, by the way, terminate, sword-like, in one common (u) point), a weapon, peculiarly formed and tempered to penetrate the best mail of modern unbelieving Philistines; most of whom have sense enough to laugh (and laugh they may in perfect safety) at equipped with which Arminianism comes limping into the field of battle.

"The pointless arrow and the broken bow;"

The caput vivum of a dexterous infidel is absolutely invulnerable by the caput mortuum of free-will nonsense, though the asinine jaw-bone were wielded by the arm of Samson.

CHAP. IV.

SPECIMENS OF SCRIPTURE ATTESTATIONS TO THE DOCTRINE OF NECESSITY.

REFERENCES have already been made, in the course of the present essay, to several Scripture passages, wherein necessity is invincibly and decisively asserted. I will add a few others: and then leave the reader to judge whether necessitarians or chance-mongers give most credit to the "Divine original of the Scriptures."

I withheld thee from sinning against me. Gen. xx. 6.

It was not you that sent me hither, but God. Gen. i. 5, 7, 8.

I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go. Exod. iv. 21.

It was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel to battle; that he might destroy them utterly. Josh. xi. 20.

The stars, in their courses, fought against Sisera. Judg. v. 20.

The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich; he bringeth low, and lifteth up. 1 Sam. ii. 7.

They hearkened not to the voice of their Father; because the Lord would slay them. 1 Sam. ii. 25.

Thus saith the Lord: Behold, I will raise up evil against thee, out of thy own house; and I will take thy wives, before thine eyes, and give them to thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of this sun.—What was the consequence?—So they spread Absalom a tent upon the top of the house; and Absalom went in unto his father's concubines, in the sight of all Israel. 2 Sam. xii. 11. with 2 Sam. xvi. 22.

by so saying, "limit the Holy One of Israel." His power is still infinite. For, as some have well expressed it, an essential contradiction is no object of power.

(v) People do not see all things at once. The rising of truth upon the mind is commonly gradual; like the rising of the sun on the world. Hence, some philosophers, who are rooted necessitarians, either do not yet perceive, or forbear to acknowledge the coincidence of Scripture predestination with physical and metaphysical necessity.

But all in good time. The more these doctrines are examined and compared together, the more clearly and strongly will they be found to suppose and support each other. The Arminians are aware of this, and pelt both predestination and necessity with equal rage, and with the self-same cavils.

Not without reason. For what is predestination, but necessitas imperata; or the free and everlasting determination of God, that such and such a train of causes and effects should infallibly take place in time?—And what is philosophical necessity, but predestination elicited; or, God's determination drawn out into act, by successive accomplishment, according to the plan pre-conceived in the divine mind?—Necessity (i. e. fate or providence, to whose ceaseless agency all the laws and modes, and the very being of matter and spirit incessantly subservient) this necessity is, as a valuable person phrases it, "a strait line," however crooked it may sometimes appear to us; "a strait line, drawn from the point of God's decree." And as predestination is the point itself from which the strait line is drawn, so it is also the point into which the line progressively, but infallibly, reverts.

The Lord hath said unto him [to Shimei] Curse David. 2 Sam. xvi. 10.

And he [i. e. the evil spirit] said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his [Ahab's] prophets. And he [God] said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also: go forth, and do so.—Now, therefore the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these, &c. 1 Kings xxii. 22, 23.

Both riches and honour come of Thee, and Thou reignest over all. 1 Chron. xxix. 12.

Then rose up the chief of the Fathers of Judah and Benjamin, &c.; whose spirit God had raised to go up, to build the house of the Lord. Ezra i. 5.

The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. Job i. 21.

Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upwards. Job v. 7. And I am apt to think sparks ascend by necessity!

He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise. Job v. 12. Be men ever so shrewd, their utmost dexterity will not avail, unless the Great Superintending Creator stamp it with efficiency.

Behold he taketh away. Who can hinder him? Who will say unto him [i. e. who has a right to say unto God], What doest thou? Job ix. 12.—For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and that we should come together in judgment. Ver. 32.

Vain man would be wise [and the puny prisoner of a clod would be an independent, self-determining freewillor!] though man be

(x) And we should remain, to our dying day, nearly on a level with the animal to which we are compared, were it not for the care of those about us, and did we not necessarily become parts of a society antecedently formed to our hands. In what a state would the present generation be, had they not dropt (if I may use the expression) into a house ready built! i. e. if we had been cut off from all means of prying by the wisdom, the experience, the discoveries, the inventions, and the regulations, of those who lived before us.—It is a circumstance of unspeakable convenience, to be the children of Time's old age.

Our mental powers, like a chicken in the shell, or a plant in its semen, are no more than virtual and dormant, unless elicited by cultivation, and ripened by experience, attention, and reflection. Civil society, dress, articulate language, with all other useful and ornamental polishings which result from domestic and political connection, are, in themselves, things purely artificial and adventitious. If so, will it not follow that (ever since the fall) man is, naturally, a wild animal? Some very able reasoners have gone so far as preternaturally to pronounce him such. The late Dr. Young, in his "Centaur not Fabulous," appears to have thought that the greater part of the human species profit so little by their accessory opportunities of improvement, as to go off the stage semi-savages, at last; notwithstanding the inextinguishable and omnipotent deluge of free will, which that ingenious writer imagined every man to bring into the world with him. Strange that so immense a reservoir, inherent in the soul, should yet leave the soul so dry!

With regard to the natural wildness of man, supposed and asserted by some philosophers; thus much I think must be fairly admitted; that the oorn as a wild ass's colt. Job xi. 12. What a thunderbolt to human pride! To the τὸ αὐτοέσιον. Το αυτοδοσποτία. Το τα εὐ' ἡμῶν. Το αυτοκρατορία. Το liberum arbitrium. Το ipseitas. Το the Arminian herb called self-head. Το independency, self-authority, self-determination, self-salvation, innate ideas, and other pompous nothings, with which man's ignorance and conceit seek to plait a wreath for the enrichment of his brows. Vain man, born as a wild ass's (x) colt! "How keenly," says a fine writer, "is this comparison pointed!—Like the ass's: an animal remarkable for its stupidity, even to a proverb. Like the ass's colt: which must be still more egregiously stupid than the dam. Like the wild ass's colt: which is not only blockish, but stubborn and intractable; neither possesses valuable qualities by nature, nor will easily receive them by discipline. The image, in the original, is yet more strongly touched. The comparative particle like is not in the Hebrew. Born a wild ass's colt. Or, as we should say in English, a mere wild, &c." (Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, dial. 13.)

He [i. e. God] is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doth. He performeth the thing that is appointed for me. And many such things are with him. Job xxiii. 13, 14. Query: Who is self-determiner? Man or God? Surely, God. Nor is he only the self-determiner, but the all-determiner likewise; throughout the whole universe both of spirits and of matter.

For he looketh to the ends of the earth, hypothesis derives much subsidiary force from various pertinent and well authenticated facts. For if any credit be due to human testimony, there have been instances of exposed infants, who were nursed by forest animals; and, when grown up, went prone on all-four, with a swiftness greatly superior to that of the nimblest running footman; but totally unable (and no wonder) to form the least articulate sound. It is added that, like any other wild creature, they would fly from the human sight (i. e. from the sight of their own species refined), with a roar of fear and hatred, into the thickest recesses of the woods.

Civilization, though a very poor succedaneum for that divine image originally impressed on our immortal part, and lost by Adam's transgression, is, however, of very great secular importance. Nay, its importance is, with regard to millions of us, more than secular; for it is often a providential means of qualifying us to receive and understand that blessed gospel which, when made the vehicle of divine power to the heart, issues in our recovery of God's image, and in the salvation of the soul.

After all, let the instruments of our refinement, and of our knowledge (whether in things temporal, or in things sacred) be who or what they may; and let us profit ever so deeply by our intercourse with the living, by converse with the recorded wisdom of the dead, by the perceptions we receive from external objects, and by reflecting on the ideas of which those perceptions are the source; still, no advantages are any thing more to us than divine Providence makes them to be. Let him, therefore, that glories, glory in the Lord.—For it is God who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven. 1 Cor. i. 31. Jo xxxv. 11.

and seeth under the whole heaven : to make a weight for the winds ; and he weigheth the waters by measure. He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder. Job xxviii. 25, 26.

When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and, when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only. Job xxxiv. 29. Absolute necessity still.

By the breath of God frost is given ; and the breadth of the water is straitened. Also, by watering, he wearieth the thick cloud : he scattereth his bright cloud. He causeth it to come ; whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy. Job xxxviii. 10, 13. We see from this, as well as from a preceding and from two or three subsequent quotations, that the air cannot be compressed into a current of wind ; nor rain find its way to the earth ; nor exhalations kindle into thunder and lightning ; nor a river overflow its banks ; nor suspended vapours condense into snow or hail ; nor water freeze ; or, when frozen, thaw ; without the express appointment of God's will, and the hand of his particular providence. Second causes are but effects of his decree : and can operate no farther than he, from whom they derive their whole activity, condescends to make use of them as mediums of his own agency.

The kingdom is the Lord's ; and he is the governor among the nations. Psalm xxii. 28.

O Lord, thou preservest man and beast. Psalm xxxvi. 6.

Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. Psalm cxxvii. 1.

Whatsoever the Lord pleaseth, that did he ; in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and in all deep places. He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth : he maketh lightnings for the rain ; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures. Psalm cxxxv. 6, 7.

He covereth the heaven with clouds, he prepareth rain for the earth, he maketh grass to grow upon the mountains. He giveth to the beast his food ; and to the young ravens, which cry. He maketh peace in thy borders, and filleth thee with the finest wheat. He giveth snow like wool ; he scattereth the hoar frost like ashes. He casteth forth his ice like morsels ; who can stand before his cold? he sendeth out his word, and melteth them ; he causeth his winds to blow, and the waters flow. Psalm cxlvii. 8, 9, 14, 18. What so variable and uncertain, humanly speaking, as the weather? And yet we see all its modes and changes are adjusted and determined from moment to moment, by divine impression, i. e. by a necessity, resulting from the will and providence of the Supreme First Cause. Fire and hail ; snow and vapour ; stormy wind fulfilling his word ! Psalm cxlviii. 8.

Neither is material nature alone thus (y) "bound fast in fate." All other things, the "human will" itself not excepted, are no less tightly bound, i. e. effectually influenced and determined. For,

The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, are from the Lord. Prov. xvi. 1. That is, men can neither think nor speak ; they can neither resolve, nor act, independently of Providence.

The Lord hath made all things for himself ; for the manifestation of his own glory, and for the accomplishment of his own designs : even the wicked, for the day of evil. Prov. xvi. 4. If so, he has endued none of his creatures with a self-determining power, which might issue in counteracting and defeating the purposes of his infinite wisdom.

A man's heart deviseth his way : but the Lord directeth his steps. Prov. xvi. 9. Ye<sup>a</sup> there are many devices in a man's heart : nevertheless, the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand. Prov. xix. 21.

The lot is cast into the lap : but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord. Prov. xvi. 33.

Even the king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water : and he turneth it whithersoever he will. Prov. xxi. 1. Odd sort of self-determination, this!

Enemies and evil-minded-men are under the absolute control of God ; nor can their enmity or their wickedness do a jot more hurt than he gives leave. O Assyrian, the rod of my anger. Isa. x. 5. Thou art my battle-axe and weapons of war : for with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms. Jer. li. 20. Very extraordinary declarations these, if men are self-determining agents ! a self-determining rod, for instance : a self-determining battle-axe ; a self-determining hammer ! Arminianism does that which God, by the prophet, satirizes in the following lively terms : Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? or shall a saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? As if the rod should shake itself against them that lifted it up! or as if a staff should lift up itself as though it were no wood! Isa. x. 15.—What! is that noble freewiller, man, comparable to an axe, to a saw, to a rod, and to a stick; not one of which can operate, or so much as move, but in proportion as it is acted upon? This is worse than being likened to Mr. Wesley's clock-work! But who can help it?

The prophet goes on, elsewhere. The Lord of hosts hath sworn [i. e. hath solemnly and immutably decreed], saying, Surely, as I have thought, so shall it come to pass: and as I have purposed, so shall it stand. This is the purpose which is purposed upon the whole earth; and this is the hand that is stretched out upon all nations. For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? And his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back? Isa. xv. 24, 26, 27. Grand and conclusive questions! Questions, however, which lordly Arminianism can solve in a moment. Who shall disannul God's purpose? Why human freewill to be sure! Who shall turn back God's hand? Human self-determination can do it with as much ease as our breath can repel the down of a feather!

I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil. I the Lord do all these things. Isa. xlv. 7.

Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass; when the Lord commandeth it not? Lam. iii. 37. The highest angel cannot.

Wisdom and might are God's. He changeth the times and the seasons. He removeth kings, and setteth up kings. He giveth wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding. Dan. ii. 20, 21.

Locusts, and other ravaging insects, cannot afflict a land, without a commission under the great seal of Providence. The locust, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, and the palmer-worm; my great army, which I sent among you. Joel ii. 25.

Shall there be evil in a city [viz. any calamitous accident, as it is commonly called], and the Lord hath not done it? Amos iii. 6.—Impossible.

I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another city.—I have smitten you with blasting, and mildew.—I have sent among you the pestilence.—Your young men have I slain with the sword. Amos iv. 7—10.

They [Paul and Timothy] were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia.—They essayed to go into Bithynia: but the Spirit suffered them not. Acts xvi. 6, 7. Had self-determination any thing to do here?

A certain woman, named Lydia, heard us; whose heart the Lord opened, so that she attended to the things that were spoken by Paul. Acts v. 14.

As many as were ordained unto eternal life believed. Acts xiii. 48.

I am carnal, sold under sin. For that which I do ε γινωσκω, I am far from approving: for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. To will is present with me: but how to perform that which is good, I find not. For the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which

I would not, that I do. When I would do good, evil is present with me. I delight in the law of God, after the inner man: but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then, with the mind, I myself serve the law of God: but with my flesh, the law of sin. Rom. vii. 14, 25. According to the account which St. Paul here gives of himself, he no more dreamed of his being a self-determiner, than of his having attained to sinless perfection. No wonder that some flaming Arminians have a peculiar spite against this Apostle!

In whom [i. e. in Christ] we also have obtained an inheritance: being predestinated, according to the purpose of him who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will. Eph. i. 11.

Speaking of affliction and persecution, the apostle comforted himself and his fellow-sufferers, by resolving all into necessity; that no man should be moved by these afflictions; for ye yourselves know that we are appointed thereto. 1 Thess. iii. 3.

What idea St. James entertained concerning free-will and self-determination, fully appears from the following admonition: Ye know not [much less can ye be the disposers of] what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? it is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. Ye ought to say, if the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that. James iv. 14, 15.—Why did St. James reason in this manner? Because he was endued with grace and sense to be a necessitarian.

So was St. Peter. Hence he tells the regenerated elect, to whom he wrote, Ye also, as lively stones, are built up, a spiritual house. 1 Pet. ii. 5. This is giving free-will a stab under the fifth rib. For can stones hew themselves, and build themselves into a regular house? no more, in this apostle's judgment, can men form themselves into temples of the Holy Ghost. It is the effect of necessitating grace.

The prophecy came not, in old time, by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. 2 Pet. i. 21.—Necessity again.

There shall come, in the last days, scoffers, walking after their own lusts. 2 Pet. iii. 3.—But the apostle could not have been sure of this, without taking necessity into the account, or, as himself expresses it, unless they who stumble at the word were appointed to disobedience. 1 Pet. ii. 8

There are certain men crept in unawares who were before, of old, ordained to this condemnation. Jude 4. If so, were not the sin and condemnation of those men necessary and inevitable?

CHAP. V.

PROOFS THAT CHRIST HIMSELF WAS AN ABSOLUTE NECESSITARIAN.

LEST any who may not, hitherto, have considered the subject with the same attention that I have done, should be startled at the title of this chapter, I shall adduce the larger evidence, in order to make good what the title imports. The reader will not, however, expect a synopsis of the whole evidence by which this great truth is authenticated; for, were I to attempt that, I must transcribe well-nigh all the 89 chapters of the four evangelists.

It should seem that our blessed Lord began his public ministrations with his sermon on the Mount, recorded Matt. v. vi. and vii. In that discourse are the following passages.

One jot, or one tittle, shall in no wise pass from the law, until all be fulfilled.

Thou canst not make one hair white or black.

Your Father, who is in heaven, maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. Surely, man can neither promote nor hinder the rising of the sun and the falling of the rain!

Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever.—How can a free-willer say the Lord's Prayer?

Which of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit unto his stature? The word ἡλικία signifies both stature and age. As we have no single term in English which comprises both those ideas together, the passage should be rendered periphrastically: which of you, by being anxious, can either make addition to his stature, or prolong the duration of his life?

Be not tormentingly distressed concerning futurity: for futurity shall take care of its own things. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof: i. e. commit yourselves, in a believing and placid use of reasonable means, to the will and providence of him who has already laid out the whole plan of events in his own immutable purpose. The appointed measure of supposed evil is infallibly connected with its day, which no corrodings of imaginary anticipation can either stave off, or diminish.

"Reasonable means! are not all means, hereby, shut out of the case?" No. Not in any respect whatever. For we know not what means God will bless, until we have tried as many as we can. But, when all tried, the result still rests with him.

I shall only quote one other passage from the sermon on the Mount.—The rain [of affliction] descended, and the floods [of temptation] came, and the winds [of persecution] blew, and beat upon that house [the house of an elect, redeemed, converted soul]: but it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock. That is, in plain English, it could not fall. It stood, necessarily: or, as the sense is yet more forcibly expressed in St. Luke, when the flood arose, the stream beat vehemently upon that house, and could not shake it, Luke vi. 48.

In other parts of the gospels, we find Christ reasoning and acting on the highest principles of necessity.

I will; be thou clean: said he, to the poor leper. What was the consequence? And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. Matt. viii. 3. The effect necessarily followed. The leper could not but be healed.

And, indeed, what were all the miracles wrought by Jesus, but effects of his irresistible and necessitating power? Let the Christian reader examine and weigh each of those miracles with this remark in his eye; and he will soon become a convert to the doctrine of necessity. Was it possible for those miracle: not to have taken effect? i. e. was it possible for Christ's miracles not to have been miracles? Was it chance which armed his word with ability to heal and to destroy? If so, farewell to all Christianity at once. I can perceive no shadow of medium between necessity and rank infidelity.

Neither can I make any thing of the prophecies of Christ, unless those prophecies be considered as infallible: i. e. as inferring a certain, or necessary, accomplishment, in every part. For if a single predicted circumstance can possibly happen, otherwise than it is foretold, the entire argument for the truth of divine revelation, drawn from the topic of prophecy, moulders into dust.

Nor is the Arminian self-determining hypothesis more compatible with (what is the essential basis of prophecy) the fore-knowledge of God. If, for example, it so lay at the free-will of Christ's betrayer and murderers that they might, or might not, have betrayed and crucified him; and if it so lay at the free-will of the Romans as that they might, or might not, have destroyed Jerusalem; it will follow that those events were philosophically contingent: i. e. there was no certainty of their taking place, till after they actually had taken place. The self-determining will of Judas might possibly have determined itself another way. So might the self-determining will of every person concerned in the crucifixion of Christ. And so might the self-determining wills of those Romans who besieged and razed Jerusalem. Consequently (on that principle), divine fore-knowledge could not, with certainty, know any thing of the matter. For that which is not certainly future, is not certainly foreknowable. It may be empty considered as possible: or (at the very utmost) be uncertainly guessed at as not improbable. But knowledge must be left out of the question, for knowledge will stand on none but (z) certain ground. God does not foreknow, but afterknow (i. e. he is never sure of a thing's coming to pass, until it does or has come to pass), if it be in the power of his creatures to determine themselves to a contrary point of the compass.

"Oh, but God foreknows to what particular point of the compass they certainly will determine themselves." Pray leave out the word certainly; and likewise the word will; for they stab poor self-determination to the heart. If you retain these words and their ideas, you give up the very essence of your cause. For what certainly will be is no longer uncertain. And what is not uncertain is necessary, or will surely come to pass, and cannot but do so: else the certainty evaporates into nothing.

When Christ sent his disciples for an ass's colt, which he foreknew and foretold they would find exactly at such a place, he added, that the owner of the animal, on their saying the Lord wants it, would immediately permit them to lead it away. They went to the village, and made up to the very spot; where every thing fell out precisely as their heavenly Master had predicted. Let me ask: Was the man's consent to part with his colt necessary, or was it uncertain? All circumstances considered, had he power to refuse, and might he actually have refused to let go his property? If (which was certainly the case) he could not possibly withhold his assent, Christ's foreknowledge was real; and the man himself what the ingenious Mr. Wesley would term, "a fine piece of clock work;" but what I should term a necessary free-agent. If, on the other hand, he might have denied complying with the disciples' request, and could have dismissed them without success; it will necessarily follow that our Lord shot his arrow at a venture, sent his messengers on a blind errand, and that his own foreknowledge was not foreknowledge, but random conjecture and surmise. "Oh, but our Lord foreknew that the man certainly would do as requested." Then the man could not help doing it. His volition was inevitable. It could not have been infallibly known that he certainly would comply, if that compliance was antecedently uncertain, and if it could so have happened that he might not have complied.

Thus does Scripture-prophecy (not one only, but every individual prophecy in God's book) demonstrate, 1. The absolute foreknowledge of the three divine persons: and, 2. The unalterable necessity, or indefeatable futurity, of things foreknown.

Either God is ignorant of future events, and his understanding, like that of men, receives gradual improvement from time and experience and observation (a supposition blacker, if possible, than atheism itself), or the whole train of incidents, even to the rise and fall of a mote in the air, ever was, now is, ever will be, and ever must be,

(z) There are four links which all the art of men can never separate; and which proceed in the following order: Decree—Foreknowledge—Prophecy—Necessity. Let us take a short Scripture view of those sacred links, and of their connection with each other.

I am God, and there is none else: I am God, and there is none like me: declaring the end from the beginning; and, from ancient times, the things that are not yet done: saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.—Yea, I have spoken: I will also bring it to pass. I have purposed: I will also do it. Isa. xlii. 9, 10, 11. I admit that this sublime passage had immediate reference to the certainty of Babylon's capture by Cyrus. But not to that only. "The things which are not yet done," as well as that in particular, are all known to Jehovah; and many of them explicitly predicted likewise. And on what is God's absolute and all comprising knowledge grounded? On the "counsel," or decree; and on the "pleasure" or sovereign and almighty determination, of his will.—By the same rule that God had predestinated and did foreknow the exploits of Cyrus, he must have predestinated and foreknown the exploits of every other man. Since, if any one being, or any one fact, incident, or circumstance, be unknown to God; every being, fact, incident, and circumstance, may be equally unknown by him. But, putting matters upon the best footing on which Arminianism can put them; the divine knowledge can neither be eternal, nor infinite, nor infallible, if aught is exempted from it, or if aught can happen otherwise than as it is foreknown.

How great a stress God lays on this attribute of complete and unmistakable prescience; and how he claims the honour of it, as one of those essential and incommunicable perfections by which he stands distinguished from false gods; may be seen, among other places, in Isaiah xli. 21—23, and xlii. 8, 9, and xliii. 9, 12, and xlv. 21.—Well, therefore, might St. James declare in the synod of apostles and elders held at Jerusalem, known unto God are all his works, απ' αιωνος, from eternity. Acts xv. 18.

The late excellent Mr. William Cooper, of Boston in New England (I say the late, because I suppose that good man to be, ere this time, gathered into the assembly of saints made perfect) observes, in the second of his Four Discourses on Predestination unto Life, that it was the Scripture doctrine of God's omniscience which proselyted our famous Dr. South to Calvinism. "I have it," says Mr. Cooper, "from very good authority," [appealing in the margin to Dr. Calamy's Continuation, vol. i. p. 146] "that some time after the restoration, Dr. South being in company, at Oxford, with several persons of note, and among the rest, with Mr. Thomas Gilbert, who was afterwards one of the ejected ministers; they fell into a conversation about the Arminian points.—On Mr. Gilbert's asserting that the predestination of the Calvinists did necessarily follow upon the prescience of the Arminians; the doctor presently engaged, that if he [Gilbert] could make that out, he [Dr. South] would never be an Arminian as long as he lived. Mr. Gilbert immediately undertook it; and made good his assertion to the satisfaction of those present. And the doctor himself was so convinced as to continue to the last a very zealous assertor of the reformed (i. e. of the Calvinistic) doctrine, against its various opposers."

exactly that, and no other, which he (a) certainly knew it would be. Foreknowledge, undarkened by the least shadow of ignorance, and superior to all possibility of mistake, is a link which draws invincible necessity after it, whether the Scripture doctrine of predestination be taken into the account or no.

Take a few more evidences of our Lord's necessitarianism.

When they deliver you up [to be tried as religious criminals at the Jewish and Heathen tribunals], take no thought how or what you shall speak. For it shall be given you, in that same hour, what you shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father, who speaketh in you. Matt. x. 19, 20.

Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Matt. x. 29, 30.

O Father, thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Matt. xi. 25.

It is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to them it is not given. Matt. xiii. 11.

Without a parable spake he not unto them: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet. Matt. xiii. 34, 35.

Flesh and blood have not revealed unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven. Matt. xvi. 17.

Upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Ver. 18.

The Son of man must go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things, and be killed, and rise again the third day. Ver. 21.

(a) Properly speaking, it cannot be affirmed of God, that he either did know, or that he will know; but simply, that he knows. For in Deum non cadunt prius et posterius: there is no past, nor future, to him. All is present, and unsuccessive. The distributions of things, into those that have been, those that are, and those that shall be; is, indeed, suited to the flux condition, and to the limited faculties of beings like ourselves, whose estimates of duration are taken from the periodical journeys of an opaque grain round a lucid speck termed the sun; but can have no place in him, of whom it is declared, that a thousand years are with the Lord, as one day, and one day as a thousand years. And even this declaration, magnificent as it is, falls infinitely short of the mark.

When, therefore, I speak of foreknowledge as an attribute essential to Deity; I speak, as St. Paul says, after the manner of men. The simple term, knowledge, would be more intrinsically proper; but then it would not so readily aid the conceptions of ordinary persons. Though, for my own part, I would always rather call the divine knowledge omniscience, than give it any other name.

Let me just hint, that if all things without exception and without succession are eternally present, as an invisible point, to the uncreated view; necessity comes in with a full tide. For that which is always a philosophical now, can be no other, nor otherwise, than it is.—Not to add: that the Deity, whose view of all things is thus unchangeably fixed and perpetual, and intransitory, must have within him

It must needs be (Αναγκη εστι, there is a necessity) that offences come. Matt. xviii. 7. Or, as St. Luke has it, it is impossible (αγενδεκτον, it is not expectable) but that offences will come: Luke xvii. 1. Our Lord not only asserted the thing which we mean by necessity, but even made use of the word itself. And so we find him doing, in three or four other parts of the gospels. Nor is the sense in which he used the term left ambiguous; as appears from comparing the two above passages together. Necessity is that by which things cannot without the utmost folly and absurdity, be expected to come to pass any otherwise than just as they do. But Arminianism pays very slender regard to Christ's authority.

Go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take the fish that first cometh up, and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money. Matt. xvii. 27.

All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given. He that can receive it, let him receive it. Matt. xix. 11, 12.

To sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give, except unto them for whom it is prepared of my Father. Matt. xx. 23.

Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward, for ever. And presently the fig-tree withered away. Matt. xxi. 19.

Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. Matt. xxi. 44.

Many are called, but few are chosen. Matt. xxii. 14.

Fill you up the measure of your fathers. How (b) can you escape the damnation of hell? Matt. xxiii. 32, 33.

I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill self a constant and irremediable source of standing uneasiness, if any thing can happen in contrariety to his will, and so as to cross or defeat the wisdom and goodness of his designs. He must certainly interest himself, and very deeply too, in the accomplishment of a will which is all holy, and all right, and all wise. Consequently, could such a will (and his will is precisely such) be frustrated, though but in one single instance: that frustration would necessarily be a calamity on God himself, and inflict essential and never ending pain on the divine mind. Another (I think, irrefragable) proof, that nothing is left to contingency.

(b) Monsieur Le Clerc (who would have thought it?) has a passage, so full to the sense of this observable text, that one would almost imagine he designed it for the very purpose. "Posito, hominem peccato deditum esse; nec per totam vitam id habere, quod necessario postulatur ad habitum peccati extendum, inde colligimus, necessitate consequentie, hominem in peccato mansurum, nec ullâ ratione vitaturum pœnas peccatori debitas impuniti." Ontolog. cap. 13.

I really wonder at the above writer's expressing himself thus. But I do not want to hear the excellent Le Clerc re-mark as follows. "Nonne clarè sequitur, dum Deus opere suo in nobis non adest, omnia esse mala quæ facimus, et nos necessarii operari que nihil ad salutem valent? Si enim non nos, sed solus Deus operatur salutem in nobis; nihil, ante opus ejus, operamur, salutem, velimus, nolumus." (De Seruo Arbitr. Sect. 43.) &c. It is clearly and crucify, and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues; and persecute them from city to city; that upon you may come all the righteous bloodshed upon the earth. Matt. xxiii. 34, 35.—Say not, "Where is the justice of this?" Justice belongs to another argument. We are not now treating of justice, but of necessity. Keep to the point.

Two men shall be in the field: one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill: one shall be taken, and the other left. Matt. xxiv. 40, 41.

This night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. Matt. xxvi. 34. Might Peter not have denied him? and might Christ have proved mistaken?

If it be possible, let this cup pass from me. Matt. xxvi. 35.—But it was not possible.

Thinkst thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, &c.? but how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? Ver. 53, 54.

All this was done, that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Ver. 56.

And they crucified him, and parted his garments, casting lots; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken, &c. Matt. xxvii. 35. Nothing but mere necessity, from beginning to end!

My appeals to the other three evangelists shall be extremely concise.

He goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him whom he would, and they (c) came unto him. Mark iii. 13.

If any man hath ears to hear, let him hear. Mark vii. 16.

With men it is impossible: but not with God. Mark x. 7.

Except the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved. But, for the elects' sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days.—False prophets should seduce, if it were possible, even the elect. Mark xiii. 20, 22.

One of you, that eateth with me, shall betray me. Mark xiv. 18.

All ye shall be offended, because of me this night. Ver. 27.

The hour is come: the Son of man is betrayed, &c. Ver. 41.

But the Scriptures must be fulfilled. Ver. 49.

Many widows were in Israel, but to none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, to a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel, in the time of Eliseus the prophet: but none of them were cleansed, save Naaman the Syrian. Luke iv. 26, 27.

I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also: for therefore am I sent. Ver. 43.

Not one of them [i. e. not a single (d) sparrow] is forgotten before God. Ib. xii. 6.

All things that are written by the prophets, concerning the Son of man, shall be accomplished. For he shall be delivered to the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, &c. Luke xviii. 41.

There shall not an hair of your head perish. Luke xxi. 18.—i. e. before the appointed time.

Truly, the Son of man goeth [to crucifixion and death] as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed. Luke xxii. 22.—What a different view did Christ entertain of predestination and necessity from that which the Arminians profess to have! The Son of God connects two ideas, which those gentlemen are for setting at an infinite distance: namely, the determining decree of his Father, by which moral evil is effectually permitted; and the penal woe, justly due to the persons who, in consequence of that effectual permission, are necessarily evil agents. I shall just touch again upon this particular, when we come to John xix. 11.

This, that is written, must yet be ac-evident that, until God is present in us by his own gracious influence, whatever we do is evil: and we necessarily do those things only which have no tendency to salvation. For if it is God alone who worketh salvation in us, and not we in ourselves, we can do nothing salutary, will we or nill we, until he himself actually doth so work in us. Well said, honest Martin. To God's blessing upon the bold and faithful assertion of such noble truths as this, we owe our reformation from Popery. And nothing will finally preserve us from being carried captive into the Popish Egypt again, but the revival and prevalence of the same noble truths which at first led us forth from that house of bondage.

(c) It is precisely the same in the spiritual conversion of the soul to God. None can come until effectually called: and they who are called effectually cannot but come. For, as the profound and judicious Mr. Charnock unanswerably argues, "If there be a counsel [i. e. a display of godlike wisdom and design] in framing the lowest creature, and in the minutest passages of providence; there must needs be an higher wisdom in the government of creatures to a supernatural end, and in framing the soul to be a monument of his glory." [Charnock on the Attributes, p. 373].—I have met with many treatises on the divine perfections; but with none which any way equals that of Mr. Charnock. Perspicuity, and depth; metaphysical sublimity, and evangelical simplicity; immense learning, and plain, but irrefragable, reasoning; conspire to render that performance one of the most inestimable productions that ever did honour to the sanctified judgment and genius of a human being. If I thought myself at all adequate to the task, I would endeavour to circulate the outlines of so rich a treasure into more hands, by reducing the substance of it within the compass of an octavo volume. Was such a design properly executed, a more important service could hardly be rendered to the cause of religion, virtue, and knowledge. Many people are frightened at a folio of more than 800 pages, who might have both leisure and inclination to avail themselves of a well-digested compendium.

(d) "Oh blindness to the future, wisely giv'n,
That each may fill the circle mark'd by heav'n!
Who sees, with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall."

complished in me, and he was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning me have an end [i. e. they shall every one come to pass]. Luke xxii. 37.

This is your hour, and the power of darkness. Ver. 53.

Ought not Christ to have suffered these things? Ib. xxiv. 26.—i. e. Was there not a necessity for those very sufferings, and were they not inevitable? Certainty itself is not more certain. The entire chain of his humiliation proceeded just as it should, without one circumstance deficient, or one redundant. It all fell out precisely as it ought: and ought to have fallen out precisely as it did. Why? Because God had decreed it, and because man's salvation (which was no less decreed) required it. It was predestinated that Christ should be delivered up to death, even to the death of the cross, and there make his soul an offering for sin. But he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer: nor crucified without crucifiers. The means, therefore, no less than the end, were necessarily included (as they always are) within the circle of divine pre-appointment.

But I go on.

That which is born of the flesh is flesh: and that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit. John iii. 6.—What is this but saying, Man, in his natural state, is necessarily corrupt: man, in a regenerate state, is necessarily biassed to God.

If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of him. John iv. 11.—But she did not know him, and therefore could not so pray to him. Our Lord, however, knew her to be one of his elect, and that the time of her conversion was very near. And, that she might be converted precisely at the very time appointed, he must needs go through the territory of Samaria. John iv. 4.

The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead [elect souls, but hitherto unregenerated, and of course dead to God] shall hear the [converting] voice of the Son of God; and, hearing, they shall live. Ib. v. 25.—All true conversion is wrought by invincible power. The dead necessarily continue so, until they are necessarily raised to life. A dead soul, no more than a dead body, can neither quicken itself, nor hinder God from doing it. Whoever goes to Christ and heaven goes thither by gracious necessity: a necessity so powerful that it even makes him willing to go.

All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me. Chap. vi. 37.—They come necessarily: i. e. they cannot but believe with the faith which is of the operation of God.

This is the Father's will, who sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing; but should raise it up again at the last day. Ver. 39.—God's will is necessity itself.

No man can come to me, except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him.—It is written in the prophets, and they [i. e. my people] shall be all taught of God. Every man, therefore, that hath heard and hath learned [i. e. who has been drawn] of the Father cometh unto me. John vi. 44, 45.—Necessity on both sides! until drawn, none can come: and, when drawn, none can stay away.

Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto me, except it be given to him of my Father. Ver. 65.

They sought to take him; but no man laid hands on him, because his hour was not yet come. Chap. vii. 30.—Until then, their hands were tied and bound with the invisible, but adamantine chain of necessity. And yet I suppose, because they did not see nor feel the chain, they looked upon themselves as self-determining free-agents!

Whosoever committeth sin is the servant [δσλος, the slave] of sin. Chap. viii. 34. But, according to the Arminian view of things, it is such a slavery as was never heard of before; the slave is at perfect liberty all the while! I cannot believe this. On the contrary, I believe what follows:

If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. Ver. 36.—Observe, until Christ make us free from the guilt and dominion of sin, we are necessarily in thralldom to both. If he deliver us, we are necessarily emancipated from each.

Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word. John viii. 43.—A plain, pertinent, decisive reason.

He that is of God heareth God's words; ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God. Ver. 47.—Either not chosen, or, at least, not yet drawn and taught of him.

I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day. Chap. ix. 4. Christ was under a necessity of doing so. He could not do any other.

Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world; that they, who see not, might see; and that they, who see, may be made blind. Ver. 39.—Can any thing be more strongly expressed than this?

A stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him; for they know not the voice of strangers. Chap. x. 5.—i. e. The converted elect disapprove of false teachers, as necessarily as sheep run away from a strange man they are afraid of.

Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also must I bring, and they shall hear my voice. Ver. 16.—I must and they shall. What is this but double necessity?

Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. Ver. 26.—Consequently, faith hangs not upon man's self-determination, but on God's own self-determined election.

I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish. John x. 28. i. e. Their salvation is necessary, and cannot be hindered.

Lazarus, come forth! Chap. xi. 43.—Was it in Lazarus's power not to awake and rise up?

Though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him; that the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake: Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? Therefore they could not believe, because Esaias said again, he hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them. Chap. xi. 37, 40. If an Arminian can extract free-will and self-determination from these flowers, he possesses a very different alembic from any which I am master of.

One of you shall betray me:—he it is to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it. And, when he had dipped the sop, he gave it Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. And after the sop, Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly. Chap. xiii. 21, 26, 27.—Awful process!

I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter,—whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him. John xiv. 16, 17.

Because I live, ye shall live also. Ver. 19.—Christ lives and reigns in glory, necessarily: and so must his people.

Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you; that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain. Chap. xv. 16.

They have both seen and hated both me and my Father: but this cometh to pass, that the word might be fulfilled which is written in their law; they hated me without a cause. Ver. 24, 25.

Father, the hour is come. Chap. xvii. 1. The predestinated season of my crucifixion and death.

None of them [none of my apostles] is lost, but the Son of Perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. Ver. 12.

The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it? Chap. xviii. 11.—A cup, all whose ingredients were mixed in the Father's decree, and administered by Providence, though wicked men were the instruments of accomplishing God's counsel. Qui vult finem, vult etiam media ad finem.

Pilate said unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death. That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying by what death he should die. John xviii. 31, 32.—God had decreed, and Christ himself had foretold, that he should die by crucifixion. But had the Jews accepted of Pilate's overture, Christ could not have been crucified, for that was no Jewish punishment: he must have been stoned. To fulfil both decree and prophecy, they were divinely overruled, to let the Romans be his executioners: in consequence of which, he was affixed to the cross.—Necessitation throughout!

Pontius Pilate was a free-will man. He did not believe necessity. He was a sturdy (not self-determiner, for no man can be really and truly that; but a) self-determinist: i. e. he thought himself a self-determining agent. Hence his speech to Christ: Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee? To which the Lamb of God replied, Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee, hath the greater sin. John xix. 10.—Here, I presume, Mr. Wesley will step in with his favourite universal demonstration, "Not so.—If the power both of the betrayer and of the crucifier was given them, and from above too, i. e. from God himself; Judas and Pilate could have no sin at all in acting as they did, so far from having the greater sin by that means." The methodist must excuse me if I believe the testimony of Christ in preference to any cavil that can originate in Moorfields.

Again. I assert, that the Roman soldiers had it not in their power to break the Messiah's legs. For that Scripture was necessarily to be fulfilled which had said, A bone of him shall not be broken. Chap. xix. 33, 36.

On the other hand, I assert that the soldier who penetrated the Messiah's side, did it necessarily. Because another Scripture had said, They shall look upon him whom they pierced; ver. 37. So sure is that axiom, nihil est in effectu, quod non fuit in causa.

It was my intention to have produced, at much greater length than I have done in the close of the foregoing chapter, the suffrages of the Apostles, also, on behalf of this doctrine who offer their evidence from every part of the inspired epistles. But, at present, I waive this advantage: and, for brevity's sake, refer the reader, indiscrimi-nately, to any portion whatever of those writings which he may first open, or on which he may first cast his eye. Dip where you will, your own reason (abstracted from all consideration of grace) must instantly perceive that the illuminated penmen were as radicately necessitarians as their divine Master.

And now, what can a fair and capable examiner think of the Arminian self-determination doctrine? A doctrine which would impiously graft such a monster as contingency on the religion of Jesus Christ—a religion which, from its Alpha to its Omega, presents us with one grand, unbroken, and indissoluble system of necessity!

Is it any wonder that men who consider the incarnation, miracles, prophecies, perseverance, sufferings, death, and salvation of the Messiah himself, as things of chance, should likewise maintain all other events to be equally fortuitous?

Hence, the alertness and rapidity with which many of our modern Arminians (more consistent, but at the same time more atheistical, than the generality of their predecessors), not content with trampling on God's decrees, are now verging towards a flat denial even of God's absolute and unlimited knowledge. Justly sensible that their whole fairy scheme of chance, uncertainty, and contingency, is quite untenable, on the position of infallible prescience; they make no scruple to rob (if they were able) the Deity himself of a perfection essential to his very being, rather than not stick the feather of free-will in the cap of man.

CHAP. VI.

AN ARGUMENT FOR NECESSITY, DEDUCED FROM THE BALANCE OF HUMAN LIFE AND DEATH.

Was it not for that universal necessitation which results from the effective and permissive will of God, all things would be, in a moment, unhinged, disjointed, and reversed. Endless confusion, wild irregularity, and the most horrible disorder (to which the materia prima, chaos, was harmony itself), would prevail throughout the natural and the moral world.

The property of attraction, by which the earth, and every other mass of matter, cohere respectively into one body, and become capable of the most rapid motion, without dissipation of their constituent particles, is one happy effect of physical necessity. Analogous to which, but of incomparably greater importance, is that ineluctabilis ordo rerum, or unalterable contexture of antecedents and consequents, wisely pre-established in the uncreated mind: through the concealed energy of whose unerring appointment every finite intelligent being both is and does, precisely, neither more nor less, than the said unerring wisdom of the Creator designed, or resolved to permit. And this is what I should choose to call moral necessity.

Supposing that calculation to be just which estimates the adult inhabitants of our own globe at about one hundred and fifty millions; or let their real amount be what it may, who can possibly conceive the boundless distractions and desolations which must everywhere ensue were so great a number of fallen beings (like ramping horses turned loose into a field) endued with a liberty of self-determination, and left at large to the exercise of it! For we must take the exercise, and the outward operations consequent upon it, into the account: else mere self-determination would answer no other end than that of tantalizing and tormenting its respective possessors.—It is well for us that, notwithstanding our wild and licentious arrogations of sovereignty, the same Almighty Parent who, without asking our consent, whirls our planet and our persons round the sun, does, with equal certainty, and with as little ceremony, roll us and the inhabitants of all the worlds he has created on the central axis of his own decree.

We have been gravely told that this representation of things is heathenism. You should rather call it Bibleism. For that fate, or necessity, which the ancient vulgar thought proper to worship as a goddess, was, in their idea, the daughter of a blind, fickle princess, called Fortune, or Chance: who was, herself, the fabled daughter of a no less fickle old gentleman, named Oceanus. To which blind lady and her unsteady father the scheme of Christian necessity is not in the least related, either by consanguinity or alliance.

I must, however, acquit the wiser of the heathens from the absurdity of looking upon chance, or fortune, as a reality. Sensible men knew better, and laughed at the unphilosophical chimera. Nor is the antiquity of the word itself extremely high. It is acknowledged, on all hands, that Τύχη (whence the Romans took their fortuna) was a term invented long after the times of Hesiod and of Homer (in whose writings it no where occurs); and was spawned by the atheistical imagination of subsequent poets, from whom (I think) Ancus Martius adopted it, and, by building a temple to its honour, introduced it, as a deity, among the Romans.

It ill becomes the Arminians to talk of heathenism. Let them draw a solid line, if they can, between fortune and contingency. Let them shew us how the result of self-determination differs from chance. Let them reconcile their imaginary αυτεξέσιον with the necessary dependency of created beings, and with the never-ceasing agency of an universally (e) particular Providence. When they have wrought these and a few other similar impossibilities, I will then absolve their scheme from atheism. I will even acquit it of atheism.

Birth and death are the æra and the period whose interval constitutes the thread of man's visible existence on earth. Let us examine whether those important extremes be, or be not, unalterably fixed by the necessitating providence of God. If it appear that they are, we may the more easily believe that all the intercurrent events are under the control and direction of the same infallible hand.

I have heard it affirmed that Descartes, the French philosopher, was so consistent a free-willer as to have believed that death itself is absolutely subject to human self-determination: that he consequently imagined he had it in his power to protract his own age to any extent he pleased, or to cut it precisely as short as he himself chose: and would very liberally call any of his departed friends, who died with reluctance, fools, for consenting to a change they did not wish to experience. The ancient Romans, notwithstanding the adulterations with which the doctrine of free-will (and its natural attendant, scepticism) debased and corrupted their theology, were yet, in general, so decent as to acknowledge that death lay at the disposal of a Deity, less capricious than fortune, and more powerful than any created will. Hence, their occasional reciprocation of mos and fatum. To intimate that men cannot die, until God pronounces their doom; and that when he fulvus est, or issues the word of summons, the earthly vehicle can detain its guest no longer.—Poor Descartes, with all his dreams of free-will, found himself obliged to die at the age of fifty-four!

I take the ratio formalis, or precise nature of death, to be neither more nor less than the effect of separation. The separation of Spirit from matter is the immediate cause, and seems to exhaust the idea of animal death. Now only the same power which at first joined, can afterwards sever, the two principles. Let the permitted means of dissolving the union be what they may, the dissolution itself is an act of God.

Whoever considers the relative alterations, the domestic revolutions, the circulation of property, and a multitude of other negative and positive consequences which, either directly or remotely, follow on the decrease of the meanest human individual, must soon perceive that was not the sceptre of death swayed by the determinations of Infinite Wisdom, such partial inconveniences must ensue as would, in their complicated amount, materially affect, if not entirely reverse, the whole system of sublunary events. Some people (for instance) would live too long. Others would die too soon. Some would leave their assigned work unfinished: whence the Deity would be disappointed of his views, and surprised with a chasm in his administration of government. Others would survive to do more than their allotted business. Whence the Divine plan would be disconcerted; the well-compacted web become loose, broken, and entangled; and the administration of providence degenerate into a jumble of confusion, perplexity, and absolute anarchy. In one word: God could not say to any of his creatures, what he really does say to all and each of them, Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther.

Our entrance into life is determined and adjusted by the same disposing hand which fixes and regulates our departure. Necessity brings us into the world: and necessity carries us out of it. What man upon earth could help his being born at the very time and place he was? or could hinder himself from being the son of such and such parents? or alter a thousand concurring circumstances, by which his subsequent state, and his very cast of mind were effectually and necessarily stamped? How absurd, then, must it be to imagine that the line, though spun at first by the hand of necessity, is afterwards conducted, and at last cut off by the no-fingers of contingency! For it is impossible to conceive any thing so absolutely contingent and uncertain as the operations and the exit of a self-determining actor. Especially if we suppose him (and the Arminian scheme does so suppose him) to live in a world where all about him is as precarious as himself; and where the great sheet of events, instead of being let down by the four corners from heaven, is only a fortuitous complication of flimsy threads, much of which is still liable to unravelment, and the whole of which might never have been woven at all.

Might Charles the First have been the son of Cromwell's parents? And might Cromwell have been born legal heir to the English crown? Was it possible for Sir Robert Walpole to have been prime minister to queen Elizabeth; and Sir Francis Wal-

(e) Mr. Pope asks:

"When the loose mountain trembles from on high, Shall gravitation cease, 'cause you go by?"

I answer, Yes. Either gravitation shall cease, while I go by, or I shall, in some way or other, be secured from suffering by its effects; unless the will of God, to which all second causes are absolutely subordinate, commission the "loose mountain" to do me an injury. I am of the great Mr. Charnock's mind, that "There is understanding in every motion; and an eye in the very wheel that goes over us and crushes us." (Charnock on the Attributes, p. 419.)

singham to have been secretary of state to king George the Second? Yet all these impossibilities, and millions of others, might have happened, upon the Arminian scheme of chance. A scheme which, if admitted, turns every thing upside down, and knocks every thing out of joint :

“Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis.”

Why was friar Bacon, and not Sir Isaac Newton, born in the thirteenth century? Why were not the living ornaments of the present generation born an hundred, or five hundred, years back? or reserved to ages as remotely future? Arminianism may tell me, that “All this is casual: and that it was a chance, not only when and where the present race of men might be born, and what departments they should fill; how they should act, and how and when they shall die; but whether they should so much as exist at first.” I, on the contrary, discern such incontestible traces of wisdom, propriety, and design, in the distribution of particular men through successive periods of time, and in the whole connection of event with event; that, for my own part, I necessarily conclude so regular a chain could not possibly be hammered in the Cyclopæan den of contingency: but that every depending link is fitted and fixed into each other by the Supreme Intelligence himself; the disposals of whose providence, like the covenant of his grace, are ordered in all things, and sure. (f)

As lightly as some people think of the Bible, that book is the fountain of true metaphysics. A book no less weighty with the treasures of philosophic wisdom than bright with the healing beams of evangelical consolation. To this blessed oracle I now refer the question; whether human birth and death be not the effects of divine necessitation?

I shall not be very prolix. Two or three plain and pertinent testimonies will answer the same purpose as two or three hundred. Let us begin with the article of birth.

Rachel said unto Jacob, give me children, or else I die. And Jacob's anger was kindled against Rachel: and he said, am I in God's stead? Gen. xxx. 1, 2.

Joseph said unto his father, they are my sons, whom God hath given me in this place. Gen. xlviii. 9.

Thy hands have made me, and fashioned me together round about. Job x. 8.

Thou art he who took me out of the womb. Psalm xxii. 9.

Who holdeth [better rendered, who putteth] our soul in life, and suffereth not our feet to be moved. Psalm lxxvi. 9. i. e. God gave us life at first, and keeps us alive, until it is his pleasure to untie the knot that binds us to the body.

Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord. Psalm cxxvii. 3. Or, as the liturgy translation reads, Lo, children and the fruit of the womb are an heritage and gift that cometh of the Lord.

And the case speaks for itself. The birth of every single infant is productive of no less than everlasting consequences. Every infant (even supposing him to die such) is an immortal being. But supposing he lives to bear an active part in life, society is very materially concerned in his behaviour. Each adult individual makes important movements in the grand circular scale of events. The alteration of a single birth, or of a single death, from the first period of time until now, would have occasioned such a difference, that neither the visible nor the invisible world would have been as it is: i. e. something would have been wrong, either in defect, or in redundancy. None of us can tell what may hang on the nativity of the meanest infant that is born of woman. But the Creator knows; for he is acquainted with his own decrees, and orders matters accordingly.

Thou hast covered me [i. e. clothed my soul with a material body] in my mother's womb: in thy book [of decree and providence] all my members were written. Psalm cxxxix. 13, 16.

To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven: [i. e. God has fixed an exact point of time for the accomplishment of all his decrees; among which fixed and exact points of time are] a time to be born, and a time to die. Eccles. iii. 1, 2.

Who (g) formed the spirit of man within him? Zech. xii. 1.

God, who separated me from my mother's womb. Gal. i. 15.

Does it not appear, even from these few

(f) 2 Sam. xxiii. 5.—Those of us who go to Church, profess ourselves to be “tied and bound with the chain of our sins.” Why, then, should we deem ourselves too grand to be tied and bound, with the good, though not always perceivable, chain of providential necessity?

(g) This text, and many other of similar import, seem to intimate, that the body is first made, and that the soul, commanded into existence for the purpose, is united to the body thus previously provided for its reception. The direct source, however, of the soul, is an enquiry attended with great metaphysical difficulties; whether we suppose it to be of God's immediate creation, or to originate from parental transmission. Much may be said for each hypothesis: and several weighty objections lie against both. It becomes us to confess that Scripture has not clearly decided the point: and of course, that we know very little of the matter. In talibus questionibus, as Witsius says on another mysterious occasion, magis mihi placet hesitantis ingenii modestia, quam inconsiderata determinandi pervertacia. (Dissert de Michaele.) This only we are sure of, that God himself, and not chance, is (either mediately or immediately, according to the good pleasure of his own will) the formator and the governor of every spirit, and of every body, in the universe.

passages, that the doctrine of fortuitous nativity is as false and ridiculous as that of equivocal generation?

And the doctrine of fortuitous death is like unto it. Witness the following evidence.

The time drew near that Israel must die. Gen. xlvii. 29. Observe, I. A time for Jacob's death was prefixed of God; and it is therefore called, the time; meaning, that precise time, and no other. II. The time drew near; and the holy man was like a racer in view of the goal, or like a mariner in sight of the haven where he would be. III. He must die: which expression does not denote any unwillingness in Jacob; but the certainty of his departure when the destined moment should arrive.

Can any incident be more seemingly fortuitous than what we commonly call homicide, or one man's undesignedly killing another? And yet this, when it comes to pass, is according to the secret will of God: who is positively affirmed to deliver the slain party into the hand of the slayer. Exod. xxi. 13.

He [i. e. God] is thy life, and the length of thy days. Deut. xxx. 20. The author of that and the measurer of these.

The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. I Sam. ii. 6. Which exactly comports with what God says of himself: I, even I, am he; and there is no God with me: I kill, and I make alive; I wound, and I heal; neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand. Deut. xxxii. 39.

Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? Are not his days also like the days of an hireling? Job vii. 1. The stipulated hours of an hireling's labour are ascertained beforehand; they consist of so many, and no more.

Thou hast granted me life and favour; and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit. Job x. 12.

In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind. Job xii. 10.

Man's days are determined; the number of his months is with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds, which he cannot pass. All the days of my appointed time will I wait, until my change come. Job xiv. 5, 14.

Thou prevailest for ever against him [i. e. man cannot possibly extend his own life a single moment beyond thy decree]: thou changest his countenance [by death], and sendest him away. Job xiv. 20.—Sendest his body to the grave, and his soul to another world.

Lord, make me to know my end, and the measure of my days, what it is. Psalm xxxix. 4. But, unless God had fixed David's end, and had determined the measure of his days, the Psalmist would here have asked a question to which God himself could only have answered, "O son of Jesse, I know no more of the matter than you do. You have started a problem which I am unable to resolve; for there is no measuring in the case."

Thou turnest man to destruction. Psalm xc. 3.

There is no man that hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit [i. e. to retain the soul in the body beyond the time divinely prefixed]; neither hath he power in the day of death. Eccles. viii. 8.

Behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years. Isaiah xxxviii. 5. Hezekiah thought that his lease was just expiring, and that his soul must almost immediately turn out of its earthly cottage. No, says God, you have fifteen years to be added to those of your days which are elapsed; and the said future years are of my adding, no less than were the years that are past. "Oh, but God said to Hezekiah, I have heard thy prayer, and have seen thy tears." True. And what does this prove? Not that God's decree is a (h) weathercock, shifting, and changing, and veering about, just as the breath of man's free-will happens to blow; but that the Scriptural axiom is right, which says, Lord, thou hast heard the desire of the afflicted; thou preparest their heart to pray for such things as thou hast decreed to give, and thine ear hearkeneth thereto. I must farther observe; that, if there be any meaning in words, Hezekiah could not die until the remaining fifteen years had run out; and could not but die when they were.

Which of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit προς ἡλικίαν αὐτοῦ to his term of life? Let us hear the reflections of that learned, pious, and truly respectable Arminian, Dr. Hammond, on this text. After observing that ἡλικία sometimes denotes "the quantity or stature of the body," he adds: "so also doth it ordinarily signify age (and so doth קורא, which the Syriac here uses); and may possibly do so here: 1. Because the dehortation which this (question of Christ's) is brought to enforce was particularly that concerning solicitude for the life: and to that, this will be very proper, of our not being able to add, by all our solicitude, the least proportion to our age, and to enlarge the period of life πηχυν ἡνα

(h) "Prayer moves God, and overcomes him, not by causing any change in the divine will: for God is immutable; and what good he does in time for his people, he purposed before any time was. But prayer is said to overcome him, because he then gives what, from eternity, he purposed to give, upon their pra in to him. For when God decreed what he would do for his saints, he also purposed that they should pray for the same. Ezek. xxxvi. 37.—Prayer's midwifery should be used to deliver the mercies which God purposeth and promiseth. God's purpose to give doth not discharge us from our duty to ask." Gurnall's Christian Armour, vol. 17. p. 17 one cubit, i. e. one smallest measure or proportion beyond what God hath sent us. 2. It will be observable that one cubit being here set down as a very small measure, would yet be a very great proportion, being applied to the stature of the body. Nay, such as are come to their full growth (as the far greater part of Christ's auditors were) could not thus hope to add one thousandth part of a cubit to their stature. On the other side, a cubit will seem but a small part to the many years of a long life. And he that is of the fullest growth may yet hope to enlarge the period of life, and to that generally men's solicitude is applied; by diet, physic, &c., to acquire long life, not to increase their stature. 3. The word πῆχυς, cubit, is ordinarily a measure of longitude of any space, and particularly of a race to which man's life is compared; Job ix. 25. 2 Tim. iv. 7.

This truth may be farther argued from another passage, cited also in a preceding chapter, viz., Matt. x. 29, 30. For, if not a sparrow can die without God's express commission, much less can a man. And if the very hairs of our heads are numbered, much more our days.

God giveth unto all life and breath and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on the face of the earth, and hath determined the times, before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. For in him we live and are moved, and have our being; Acts xvii. 25, 26, 28. Observe: 1. God is the giver of animal life as well as every thing else.—2. He has multiplied us all from one stock, viz. Adam.—3. The times, i. e. the proper seasons of our birth and death, and of all that we shall do or suffer between the starting-post and the goal, are determined, or marked out with certainty and exactness by himself.—4. This determination or adjustment of our times is not a modern act of God, arising à re natâ, or from any present emergency of circumstances and situation of affairs; but a determination inconceivably ancient. The time was fore appointed, even from everlasting: for no new determination can take place in God without a change, i. e. without the destruction of his essence. Quævis mutatio mors est.—5. The very places which people inhabit are here positively averred to be determined and fore-appointed of God. And it is very right it should be so. Else some places might be overstocked with inhabitants, and others totally deserted: which would necessarily draw after it the most pernicious consequences: as stagnation of agriculture, famine, pestilence, and general ruin to the human species. Whereas by virtue of God's having fore-appointed and determined the bounds of our habitations, we are properly sifted over the face of the earth, so as to answer all the social and higher purposes of providential wisdom.—6. If Deity has condescended to determine in what particular places our bodies shall dwell, why should it appear strange that he should also determine how long our souls shall dwell in their bodies? Adverbs of time are no less important than adverbs of place. Nor, indeed, could omnipotence itself determine the ibi without likewise determining the quando and the diu.—Especially, when we consider, 7. That in him we every moment live, and are moved, and do exist.

Moreover, if Christ's own testimony will have any weight with self-determinationists, the following text, exclusively of all others, will set the point above dispute: where our Lord roundly affirms that he himself keeps the keys of hell and of death, Rev. i. 18. Which declaration holds true, in every sense the words are capable of. He openeth, and no man can shut; and shutteth, and no man can open, Rev. iii. 7.

Nor is Divine Providence the distributor of death to man alone. The very beasts themselves, which are, by many, supposed to perish utterly, are immortal until God cut their thread. Thou hidest thy face: they are troubled: thou takest away their breath: they die and return to their dust; Psa. civ. 29. It should be remembered, that this is more directly spoken concerning those small and great beasts, and creeping things innumerable, which inhabit the sea. So that fishes themselves, from a whale to a periwinkle, have the Creator himself for the disposer of their lives and the determiner of their deaths!

From the evidence alleged, concise and superficial as my allegations have been, we may fairly (and I think unanswerably) conclude that contingency has nothing to do with births or burials; and consequently, that chance never yet added, nor ever will add, (i) "a single unit to the bills of mortality."

If therefore, the initial point whence we start, and the ultimate goal which terminates our race, be thus divinely and unchangeably fixed; is it reasonable to suppose that chance, or any free-will but the free-will of Deity alone, may fabricate the immediate links of a chain whose two extremes are held immovably fast in the hands of God himself?—Impossible.

(i) For this phrase, a single unit to the bill of mortality, see Lord Chesterfield's Letters, Letter 334.

CHAP. VII.

THE SUPPOSED GLOOMINESS OF NECESSITY CONSIDERED.—THE ORIGIN OF NECESSITY.—CONCISE VIEW OF MANICHÆISM.—THE NATURE OF EVIL ENQUIRED INTO.—CURIOUS CONVERSATION-PIECES OF THREE MODERN PHILOSOPHERS.—SEVERAL ASSEMBLIES OF DIVINES VINDICATED.—ARMINIANS THEMSELVES ULTIMATELY FORCED TO MAKE NECESSITY THEIR REFUGE.—CONCLUSION OF THE PRESENT ESSAY.

1. GREAT declamatory pains have been taken to set the system of necessity in a very "gloomy" point of view: and to misrepresent it as made up of nothing but clouds, and shades, and thick darkness. The same has been said of religion at large, and of virtue itself. But are virtue and religion therefore deformed and black because their beauty and lustre do not strike a libertine eye? No more is the scheme of necessity tinged with real gloom on account of a proud or prejudiced free-willer's being pleased to assert it.

"I have sometimes beheld," says an elegant writer, "a ship of war, several leagues off at sea. It seemed to me a dim, cloudy something, hovering on the skirts of the horizon; contemptibly mean, and not worthy of a moment's regard.—But as the floating citadel approached the mast arose. The sails swelled out. Its stately form, and curious properties struck the sight. It was no longer a shapeless mass, or a blot in the prospect: but the master-piece of human contrivance, and noblest spectacle in the world of art." Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, Dialogue 5.

Arminianism, if you please, is a region of darkness: but necessity, a land of (k) light. For I should be glad to be informed wherein consists the cheerfulness of believing that (k) The pretended gloominess of necessity is urged with most appearance (and it is but appearance) of plausibility, against that branch of Scripture-metaphysics which relates to the decree of reprobation. Let me for a moment weigh the pretended horror of this principle; a principle which occurs so positively and repeatedly, again and again, in almost every page of the Bible, that the existence of God does not admit of more strong and explicit proof from the inspired volume, than does the awful reality of non-election. What I here mean to observe on this subject, I shall give in the words of part of a letter which I lately sent to a very eminent Anti-Calvinian philosopher, Dr. Priestley. "Why are Calvin's doctrines represented as gloomy? Is it gloomy to believe that the far greater part of the human race are made for endless happiness? There can, I think, be no reasonable doubt entertained, concerning the salvation of very young persons. If (as some, who have versed themselves in this kind of speculation, affirm) about one-half of mankind die in infancy—And if, as indubitable observation proves, a very considerable number of the remaining half die in early childhood;—And if, as there is the strongest reason to think, many millions of those who live to maturer years, in every successive generation, have their names in the Book of life: then what a very

the greater part, if not the whole, of sub-lunary events, even those of endless concern not excepted, are delivered over to the management of an imaginary goddess, called Chance; the mere creature of a poetic fiction, and the most unmeaning sound that was ever admitted into language? "Oh, but we deny chance, and maintain free-will." Be so good as to shew me how you can maintain self-determining free-will, without setting up the blind daughter of Oceanus upon her pedestal? If the will of man be free, with a liberty ad utrum libet, and if his actions be the offspring of his will, such of his actions which are not yet wrought, must be both radically and eventually uncertain: as depending for their futurity on an uncertain cause, viz., on the uncertain volitions of an agent who may or may not incline himself to the performance of those actions. It is therefore a chance whether they shall ever be performed or no. For chance and uncertainty are only two words for the same idea. So that every assertor of self determination is, in fact, whether he mean it or no, a worshipper of the heathen lady, named Fortune, and an ideal deposer of Providence from its throne.

Could Providence be really dethroned with as much ease as its influence is denied, dreadful indeed would be the state of things. For my part, I think that all the cheerfulness lies on the side of necessity. And for this plain reason: because that infinite wisdom which made or permitted us to be what we are, and to be circumstanced as we are, knows better what to do with us than we can possibly know how to dispose of our own selves.

It is my happiness to be convinced that my times are in God's hand; Psa. xxxi. 15. and that his kingdom ruleth over all, Psa. ciii. 19. If any others can extract comfort from considering themselves as vessels sail-small portion, comparatively, of the human species, falls under the decree of preterition and non-redemption!

"This view of things I am persuaded, will, to an eye so philosophic as yours, at least open a very cheerful vista through the 'gloom'; if not entirely turn the imaginary darkness into sunshine. For with respect to the few reprobate, we may, and we ought to, resign the disposal of them implicitly to the will of that only king who can do no wrong; instead of summoning the Almighty to take his trial at the tribunal of our speculations, and of setting up ourselves as judges of Deity."

I might have added that the purpose of God according to election is not restrained to men either of any particular country, or age of time, or religious denomination. Undoubtedly, there are elect Jews, elect Mahometans, and elect Pagans. In a word, countless millions of persons whom Christ hath redeemed unto God, by his blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation. Rev. v. 9.

Only take a fair and dispassionate survey of the matter as it is; and the Arminian outcries will be found a vox, et preterea nihil. For who can count the dust of Jacob, or the number of the fourth part of God's elect Israel?

ing over a dangerous ocean, without pilot, without chart, without insurance, and without convoy, to a coast unknown; much good may their comfort do them. I desire none of it.

Gloomy as the doctrine of Christian necessity is ignorantly affirmed to be, it is the only principle upon which any person can truly and consistently adopt that animating apophthegm so perpetually in the mouth of St. Chrysostom, Blessed be God for every thing that comes to pass!—Whereas the genuine language of an afflicted free-willer is, Alas! alas! what an unlucky accident was this! The very exclamation which might be expected to issue from the lips of a melancholy, desponding atheist.

If unreserved resignation to the wise and fatherly disposals of God; if contentedness and complacency within our several spheres and stations; if thankfulness for the blessings we enjoy; if the exercise of candour, lenity, and compassion toward our mistaken, our offending, and our afflicted fellow-creatures; if humility, and a deep sense of our absolute dependence on the arm of omnipotent love for preservation or deliverance from evil, and for the continuance or increase of good; if the pleasing conviction that nothing can hurt us except God's own hand first sign the license; if a just confidence that he will never sign any such license but to answer the best and wisest ends; if an unshaken persuasion that whatever he does is, and must be, absolutely and directly right, and that whatever he permits to be done is, and must be, relatively, conduively, and finally right:—If these lovely virtues, and felicitating views (virtues and views which no necessitarian can consistently be without) have any thing gloomy in them; it will follow that the sun is made up of darkness, and that beauty itself is a complication of deformity and horror.

When Mr. Pope penned the following verses (in which the philosophic inferences from the doctrine of necessity are summed up with equal truth and elegance), I cannot bring myself to suppose that the poet was in a cheerless, melancholy frame of mind. So far from being able to observe the remotest vestige of gloom, I see nothing in them but the lustre of unmingled light, and the triumph of exulting joy.

“Submit.—In this or any other sphere,
Secure to be as blest as thou canst bear.
Safe in the hand of one disposing power,
Or in the natal or the mortal hour.
All nature is but art, unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood;
All partial evil, universal good.
And, spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
One truth is clear; whatever is, is right.”

If, together with the philosophic, we view necessity through the evangetic medium;

nothing will be wanting to render the survey complete. Christian necessitarians, having sung with Mr. Pope, can also sing as follows in those cheerful lines of the late excellent Mr. Hart:

“This God is the God we adore;
Our faithful, unchangeable friend;
Whose love is as great as his power,
And knows neither measure nor end.”

’Tis Jesus, the first and the last,
Whose Spirit shall guide us safe on;
We'll praise him for all that is past;
And trust him for all that's to come.”

And so much for the pretended gloominess of necessity. Or in other words for the Æthiopic complexion of that dismal, melancholy doctrine which most dolefully asserts that all things, without excepting the worst, work together for the glory of God, and for good to them that love him. Rom. viii. 28. “Dri-plorable news indeed,” as an old lady once expressed it.

2. To shew his skill in history and genealogy, Mr. Wesley traces the origin of necessity. And thus he makes out the pedigree.

“That man is not self-determined; that the principle of action is lodged not in himself, but in some other being; has been an exceeding ancient opinion: yea, near as old as the foundation of the world. It seems, none that admit of revelation can have any doubt of this. For it was unquestionably the sentiment of Adam, soon after he had eaten of the forbidden fruit. He imputes what he had done, not to himself, but another: the woman whom thou gavest me. It was also the sentiment of Eve: the Serpent he beguiled me, and I did eat. It is true I did eat, but the cause of my eating, the spring of my action, was in another.”

Waiving all notice of the grammatical and the logical inaccuracies which adorn this paragraph, I shall with its author's leave carry the antiquity of necessity somewhat higher up.

God himself is a necessary being. He existed, and could not but exist, without beginning. He exists, and cannot but exist, without end. Necessity, therefore, is co-æval with, and inseparable from, Deity; i. e. it is truly and properly eternal: as all his other attributes are. I would term necessity, in this view of it, necessitas prima.

With regard to Adam, he was sufficiently instructed in the doctrine of necessity during the state of innocence. He could not but know that he existed necessarily, and that every circumstance of his situation was necessarily determined by a superior hand.

For example. When he was well awake from that deep sleep into which he had been necessarily cast, without his own consent first had and obtained: was not that single incident (especially when he adverted to the important effect of it) more than enough to impress a reflecting mind with the idea of necessity? The very missing of his rib which he had involuntarily lost on the occasion, must have made him a necessitarian, supposing him to have been, what I make no doubt he was, a man of common understanding.

(t) All discord, i. e. all the seemingly irregular and contrariant dispensations of Divine Providence.

Eve, likewise, could not but know that she was necessarily made, necessarily placed in Eden, and necessarily consigned to Adam.

I conclude, therefore, that the first man and his wife were necessitarians, antecedently to their fall. And if they afterwards endeavoured to account for their fall upon the principle of necessity, I must declare that, for my own part, I see neither the impiety of the attempt, nor the lameness of the reasoning.

“Oh, but this makes God the author of their falling.” By no means in the world. It is the Arminian hypothesis which represents Deity as either unseasonably absent from the place, or as looking unconcernedly on, while his feeble creature Eve was chopping unequal logic with a mightier and more artful being than herself. It is the free-will scheme which lays original sin at the divine door, by supposing that God stood neuter throughout the whole affair; though he knew (if Arminianism will allow him to have foreknown) that no less than the ruin of all mankind would be the consequence of that neutrality.

When we say that the fall of man came necessarily to pass, it is only saying that Satan is neither too strong nor too wise for God; and that Satan would not have proved too strong or too wise for Eve herself, had it been the will of God posuisse obicem, i. e. to have hindered Satan from succeeding. Now, if it was not the divine will to bar the enemy from succeeding, and if it was really foreknown that without such bar the enemy would succeed; and if God could, without injustice, actually forbear at the very critical time, to put an effectual bar in the way, though he certainly had power to do it: the inference is invincible, that Adam and Eve fell necessarily.

(m “The Manichean scheme,” says Mr. Wesley, “was formerly espoused by men of renown: St. Augustine was a heathen.” But I will do St. Austin that justice, which this gentleman withhold, by adding, that God converted him from Manichæism while yet a young man; and several years before he was so much as baptised into the Christian Church. The Methodist goes on: “Manichæism is now so utterly out of date, that it would be lost labour to confute it.” Herein he is, to express it as tenderly as I can, utterly mistaken in his reckoning. I shall clearly prove a page or two hence, that he himself is, in one respect as much, and in another respect, abundantly more, a Manichee, than either Scythian, Budda, or Manes

Mr. Wesley, by a very singular mixture of Manichæism, Pelagianism, Popery, Socinianism, Kantianism, and Atheism, has, I believe, now got to his ultimate. Probably he would go still farther if he could. But I really think he has no farther to go.—Happy settlement, after forty years infinity of shifting and flitting hither and thither!

Nor is God’s decree to permit the fall liable to any one cavil which will not hold, with equal, or with stronger force, against the actual permission itself. “But why did God decree to permit the fall, and permit the fall according to his decree?” For reasons, the whole of which he has not thought proper to communicate. He giveth not account, to any, of his matters. Job xxxiii. 13. And this is too good an answer to so daring a question.

Let me give our free-willers a momentous hint, viz., That the entrance of original sin was one of those essential links on which the Messiah’s incarnation and crucifixion were suspended. So that if Adam’s fall was not necessary (i. e. if it was a precarious or contingent event), it would follow, that the whole Christian religion, from first to last, is a piece of mere chance-medley: and consequently cannot be of divine institution. Arminians would do well to consider whether their principles lead them.

3. The true necessity is, totò cælo, remote and different from Manichæism: as indisputably appears on comparing the two systems together. Not to observe that St. Austin (who in his earlier part of life had been (m) entangled in the Manichæan net) was ultimately confirmed in his resolution to renounce those heresies, by reading the epistles of that illustrious necessitarian St. Paul.

Manes, from whom Manichæism is (though very inaccurately) denominated, was by birth a Persian, and flourished toward the close of the third century. His original name was (n) Cubric, which he afterwards dropped for that of Manes.

One Scythian, an Arabian merchant, who had made himself master of the oriental philosophy and theology, committed the substance of his collections to writing: and bequeathed his books, which were four in number, to a proselyte of his named Budda-Terebinthus. This Budda, settling afterwards in Persia, resided in the house of a widow, who had bought Manes for a slave.

“Thus weathercocks, which for a while,
Have turned about with every blast:
Grown old, and, destitute of oil,
Rust to a point, and fix at last!”

(n) “Mutato nomine, deinde Manis, vel Manetis, nomen adoptavit; Persicum aliis, quod ὀμιλητήρ dicitur, disceptatorem, agouistam: aliis Chaldaicum מַנְיָס, Græcè μανης, עַמְרָן, quod Babyloniorum lingua, significat vas, organum; quod se σακεὺς ἐκλεῖστω dicitur, quo Deus, ad doctrinæ divinæ propagationem, uti vellet. Hinc videtur factum, ut falsæ doctrinæ auctorem talmodistæ vocarint מַנְיָס; quod Elias Levita à נַמְיָס Hæretico derivat. Et reverà pius nomen Cubricus denotasse videtur כַּפְרִיק, vas vanum, contemnendum, fragile. Dein discipuli, ob invidiam Græcæ vocis, quæ Manes, designabat τοὺς μαθητὰς τῆς φωνῆς insanentem, vel surdum; literâ duplicatâ, et compositâ voce, quasi esset μαννα χεωρ, manna fundens, fecere Manichæum.

Sydenhami Hist. Christian. Sec. 3. Operum Tom I. vol. 751, 752.

On Budda's decease, the books of Scythian fell into Manes's hands: whence he drew the generality of those tenets which pass under his name, and moulded them into a system. In this odd manner did Manes come to distinguish himself as an Hæresiarch.

The amount of his system was this:

"There are two co-equal, co-eternal, and independent Gods, or infinite principles, viz. God, properly so called, alias light: and matter, alias darkness.

"The first is the author of all good: the second of all evil.

"The light God inspired the penmen of the New Testament; the dark God inspired the writers of the Old Testament. Consequently the Old Testament is worth nothing.

"These Gods are real substance; the one a good substance, the other a bad.

"In the work of creation, the good being wrought part, and the bad being wrought part.

"The good being is the maker of human souls.

"The good being united himself to the elements of air and fire; the bad being took possession of earth and water.

"The evil God made the world, and the human body, and sin, and magistracy.

"There is a Trinity; but it consists of Scythian, Budda, and Manes. Scythian's seat is in the sun; Budda's in the moon; and Manes's in the air.

"The sun in the firmament is Christ.

"Christ did not assume a real, but only a seeming body.

"The elect are those in whom the evil principle is quite done away.

"Matrimony does but unite us more closely to the evil God.

"Water-baptism is worth little.

"The souls of my auditors" [i. e. of those who constantly attended his assemblies, and imbibed his doctrines] "are thereby changed into elect souls; and so return, quite purified, to the good being.

"The souls of other people transmigrate at death into beasts, and trees, and all other kinds of vegetables.

"Inward concupiscence is a person. It is never healed, but it may be totally separated from men. In the day of judgment, each concupiscence shall be shut up in a globe, and there live in perpetual imprisonment.

"The good God and the bad God wage implacable and never-ceasing war against each other: and perpetually clog and disconcert one another's schemes and operations.

"Hence men are impelled by the forcible constraint, to good or to evil, according as they come under the power of the good Deity or the bad one."

Such is a sketch of what I have been able to collect with certainty of the absurd and execrable tenets of Manes: which form a medley of Pythagorism, Gnosticism, and almost every other ism, both Pagan and Heretical, which that and preceding ages could supply. It is probable that Budda improved upon Scythian, and that Manes improved upon both. Though, in reality, neither of the three, nor all the three together, were authors of the monstrous opinions which constituted the jumble. The opinions were taken from a variety of other sources; and the pilfering triumvirate, contrary to the practice of thieves in general, seemed resolved to steal the worst of everything they could lay their hands on.

I believe it is absolutely impossible to trace quite up to its source, the antiquity of that hypothesis which absurdly affirms the existence of two eternal, contrary, independent principles. The other oriental nations seem to have adopted it from Egypt. But whence the Egyptians had it, and when they first entertained it, we know not: at least I could never find out.

What led so many wise people, and for so great a series of ages, into such a wretched mistake were chiefly, I suppose, these two considerations: (1.) That evil, both moral and physical, are positive things, and so must have a positive cause. (2.) That a being perfectly good could not, from the very nature of his essence, be the cause of such bad things.

But (1.) Evil, whether physical or moral, does not, upon a narrow inspection, appear to have so much of positivity in it as it is probable those ancients suppose.

A man breaks his leg: i. e. the continuity or co-hesion of parts, natural to that limb, ceases to be integral. This is followed by the evil of pain. And what is pain? the absence, or privation of sensible ease antecedently enjoyed. A man's house is burnt down. The consequence is a loss, or privation of property. He does not possess as much as he possessed before. Thus (not to multiply needless instances), sickness is a privation of health: and is thence very properly termed disease. Poverty is a deficiency of wealth and conveniences. Death itself a cessation of animal life.

God forbid that I should even wish to extenuate the malignity of sin. The omnipresent Reader of hearts and Hearer of thoughts, knows that, next after his own awful displeasure, I dread and deprecate sin, in all its forms, as the greatest of possible calamities. Let us, however, with cautious and timid hand put moral evil itself into the philosophic scale.

When I was a boy, and began to read Watts's Logic, I well remember the surprise it gave me, to find that so good a man should venture to treat of sin, in the 6th Section (pt. i. chap. 2.) under the title of Not-Being. And I confess I partly wonder at it still.

But let the Doctor speak for himself. "The sinfulness of any human action is said to be a privation: for sin is that want of conformity to the law of God which ought to be found in every action of man. I think," adds the doctor, and in truth I think so too, "we must not reduce such positive beings as piety, and virtue, and truth, to the rank of non-entities, which have nothing real in them. Though sin, or rather the sinfulness of an action, may be properly called a Not-Being: for it is a want of piety and virtue. This is a most usual, and perhaps the most just way of representing these matters.

Very happily we have a fine definition of sin given us by a Logician who could not err. Πας ο ποιων την αμαρτιαν, και την ανομιαν σκει και η ΑΜΑΡΤΙΑ εστιν εκ ΑΝΟΜΙΑ. 1 John iii. 4. Every man who committeth sin, doth also commit illegality, for sin is illegality.—Whence I conclude in the first place, that sin, strictly considered, has more of negation in it than of positivity; else it could not have been properly definable by a merely negative term. For illegality imports no more than a non-commensuration to the law, as a rule or measure of length and breadth.—But, secondly, I infer that, unless sin had something of positivity in it, the illegality of it could not be said to be commissable: "Every man who committeth illegality." And yet, after all, I do not clearly discern how that can be, without the assistance of Dr. Watts's distinction (a distinction which is, I believe, admitted by most, if not all, metaphysical writers) between actions themselves, and the sinfulness of them.

Critics explain ἁμαρτία one of the Hebrew words for sin, by the Greek word ἀθεσία

(a) And a step, or an inch, beyond this we cannot go. That God willed to permit evil, cannot be doubted, but at the expense, either of his wisdom, or of his power. The reasons why he willed it are, perhaps, among those arcanæ which angels themselves have not yet been allowed to see into.

I think I may venture to assert that the Scriptures throw hardly any degree of light upon the divine motive, or motives, to this permission. And it appears incontestably plain from the writings, and from such authentic memorials as remain, of the most sagacious philosophers of preceding ages, and of every civilized clime, the Chinese themselves included: that all their various hypothesis (some of which were extremely subtle and ingenious) by which they strained both judgment and imagination, to account for the primary existence and introduction of moral and physical ataxy; terminated universally in the point whence they set out, viz., we cannot tell.

Whoever desires to see, at one view, as much as needs to be known concerning the speculations of the greatest sages among the ancients on this inextricable subject, will enjoy a most refined amusement (but attended, I think, with no feasible solution of the difficulty immediately in point) by perusing the second part of that concise, elegant, judicious, and faithful sketch of antique philosophy, entitled, A Discourse upon the Theology and Mythology of the Ancients. Written by the Chevalier Ramsay; an author, who, though, in my opinion, extremely fanciful and erroneous on some metaphysical questions, yet deserves to be loved and admired as one of the most ingenious, polite, candid, and which imports unsettledness, and, in particular, a not standing to articles before agreed upon. ἁμαρτία, the most usual word for sin, properly signifies a not walking in the right road, and a not hitting the proposed mark. ῥη is obliquity or crookedness, i. e. a want of straightness.

The Greek ἁμαρτία most certainly conveys a negative idea, and signifies, like the second Hebrew word above mentioned, a falling short of the mark.

The Latin peccatum (which some are for deriving from pe) is also explained by delictum, i. e. a failure in duty. Iniquitas, culpa, noxa, injustitia, impietas, scelus, vitium, and a multitude of others are, in strictness, terms of negation.

But (2.) in what light soever we consider those modes of being and action, called natural and moral evil; whether we view them as positive qualities, or as negative, or as mixed; still the question returns, whether the great First Cause, who is infinitely and merely good, can be, either efficiently or deficiently, the author of them?

In my opinion, the single word permission solves the whole difficulty, as far as it can be solved in the present beclouded state of human reason. Certainly God is not bound to preclude evil from among his works. It is equally certain that he can permit it, not only to obtain but even to reign. And it is as certain, that he actually does so permit it. Why? Not for want of knowledge to perceive it. Nor for want of power to hinder it. Nor for want of wisdom to counteract it. Nor for want of goodness to order all for the best. But because it was and is his unsearchable (o) will (and the will of God is rectitude itself), to allow the entrance and entertaining reasoners that ever added the enchantments of beauty to the dignity of virtue and to the riches of learning.

But still, our utmost investigations leave us precisely where they began. We know scarce any of the views which induced uncreated goodness to ordain (for, where infinity of knowledge and power and of wisdom unite in the permitter, I see no very great difference between permitting and ordaining) the intromission, or, more properly, the intromission of evil. For my own part I can with unreproving cheerfulness give God credit (and that to all eternity, should it be his pleasure to require me) for doing every thing well.

"I know but this, that he is good,
And that myself am blind."

Can any body bring the matter to a more satisfactory issue? Si non, hoc utere mœcum.

It might have been happy for that fine, but too excursive Theorist, Dr. Conyers Middleton, if he had not, with more rashness than good speed, endeavoured to overleap that boundary which God hims. If he has fixed to the present extent of human knowledge. Were we even to grant the doctor his favourite hypothesis, viz., that the whole Mosaic account of the fall is merely allegorical; the origin of evil would still remain as dark, and as deep at the bottom of the well as ever. For to what does this boasted allegory amount? Dr. Middleton shall give it us in his own words (Works, Quarto, Vol. II. p. 149). "By Adam, we are to understand reason, or the mind of man. By Eve, the flesh, or outward senses. By the Serpent, lust, or pleasure. In which allegory we see the continuance of that seeming foil to the loveliness of his works.

Arminianism (which represents moral and natural evil as entering and as reigning in defiance and contrariety to the will and wish and endeavours of the Divine Being) coincides so pactly with the Manichæan dream of two almighty conflicting principles, who reign in spite of each other, and catch as catch can; that I really wonder at the reversed modesty of those free-willers who are for shifting off the charge of Manichæism from themselves to other folks.

Nay, were I disposed to make the most of my argument, I might add, and very fairly too, That the old Manichæism was a gentle impiety, and a slender absurdity, when contrasted with the modern Arminian improvements on that system. For, which is worse? To assert the existence of two independent beings, and no more; or to assert the existence of about one hundred and fifty millions of independent beings, all living at one time, and most of them waging successful war on the designs of him that made them?

Moreover, if so very minute a crumb of the creation as this terraqueous planet which we at present occupy, can furnish out such a formidable army of independent principles (i. e. of self-determiners: in which number, infants and children themselves must be virtually included, which will swell the catalogue with about seventy millions more); the aggregate number of independent and possibly conflicting agents, contained in the universe at large, may exceed the powers of all the angels in heaven to compute. But, even confining ourselves to our own world; it will follow that Arminian Manichæism exceeds the paltry oriental quality, at the immense rate of 150,000,000 to 2! And this, at the very lowest and most favourable computation, i. e. without taking infants into the account; and without reckoning the adult self-determiners of past generations, nor of those generations which are yet to come.

Poor Manes! with how excellent a grace do Arminians call thee an heretic! And above all, such Arminians (whereof Mr. John Wesley is one) as agree with thee, in believing the attainability of sinless perfection here below; or, to use the good old Manichæan phrase, who assert that the evil principle may be totally separated from man in the present life!

"Oh, but Manes held necessity also." But what sort of necessity? Such a necessity as a child would be under, if the Dragon of Wantley was pulling him by one arm, and Moore of Moore-hall by the other. Christianity and philosophy have nothing to do with this necessity, except to laugh at it.

4. Mr. Wesley seems much displeas'd with a brace of gentlemen, whose names he has not communicated to the public; but who appear, from his account of them, to be in no very fair way towards sinless perfection.

One of these, we are told, delivered his mind to this effect! "I frequently feel tempers, and speak many words, and do many actions, which I do not approve of. But I cannot avoid it. They result, whether I will or no, from the vibrations of my brain, together with the motion of my blood, and the flow of my animal spirits. But these are not in my own power. I cannot help them. They are independent on my choice." Thus far I totally agree with the gentleman unknown. Every one of his premises is true. But the conclusion limps most mi-clearly explained the true causes of man's fall and degeneracy: that, as soon as his mind, through the weakness and treachery of his senses, became captivated and seduced by the allurements of lust and pleasure, he was driven by God out of Paradise, i. e. lost and forfeited the happiness and prosperity which he had enjoyed in his innocence."

With all the respect due to so very superior a pen, I would offer an observation or two on this passage.—1. If Adam, and Eve, and the Serpent, and the Trees of Knowledge and of Life, and the very Paradise where they grew, were all allegorical (i. e. fabulous and unreal); might not an atheist suppose, with equal reason, that the adorable Creator; whom this same history terms God, is as allegorical a being as the rest!—2. If the fall itself, as related in Scripture, be no more than a piece of moral fiction; what security have we that the Scriptural account of redemption is not equally fictitious? Indeed, where is the necessity, or so much as the propriety and reasonableness of imagining that an allegorical ruin requires more than an allegorical restoration?—3. Among a multitude of other objections, which clog the wheel of this unsatisfactory scheme, the following is one; that the difficulty of accounting for the rise of evil still subsists in all its primitive and impenetrable obscurity. For, (1.) How came the "allurements of lust and pleasure" to exist at all? especially, in a state of absolute inno-gency? (2.) How came man's "outward senses" to be so very easy of access as to fly open like the doors of an enchanted castle, at almost the first appearance of this said gigantic lady called "Allurement?" (3.) How came the human mind to yield itself so tame a "captive" to those seducing senses? Not to ask, (4.) Why the senses themselves were originally indued with that "weakness, and treachery," and power of "seduction," which the doctor so freely places to their account? I think myself warranted to conclude, that this masterly allegorizer has not "clearly explained," nor so much as thrown the least glimmering of explanation upon "the true causes of man's fall and degeneracy." What, then, do we gain by reading Moses through the doctor's allegoric spectacles? So far from gaining, we lose the little we had. The man who pulls down my house, and builds me a better in its place, deserves my thanks. But the man who takes down my dwelling under pretence that it is not sufficiently ample and elegant for a person of my dignity to inhabit, and after all his parade leaves me to sleep in the open air, unsheltered by any roof at all, does me a material injury. When infidels can raise a more commodious fabric (i. e. propo-<sup>s</sup>e a more unexceptionable system of principles) than that the Bible presents us with, we will cheerfully remove from our old house. But, until then, let those gentlemen sleep sub dio by themselves.

serably. Which conclusion (if Mr. Wesley have represented it fairly) is this: "Therefore I cannot apprehend myself to be a sinner." And pray what does the gentleman apprehend himself to be? A saint, I presume. Should this tract ever fall into his hands, let me intreat him to cry mightily to God for that supernatural influence of grace which alone is able to convince him of his sinnership; to bring him to Christ; and to save him from the evil effects which must otherwise continue to result from "the vibrations of his brain, the motion of his blood, and the flow of his animal spirits."

The other anonymous gentleman, according to Mr. Wesley's account of him, believes the omnipotence, but doubts the wisdom, and flatly denies the goodness of God. From the peculiar complexion of this creed I should have imagined that its compiler had picked up the two last articles of it at the Foundery; but Mr. Wesley precludes this surmise by giving us to understand that the gentleman is not a free-willer. For thus the creed goes on: "All the evil in the world is owing to God. I can ascribe it to no other cause. I cannot blame that cur for barking or biting; it is his nature, and he did not make himself. I feel wrong tempers in myself. But that is not my fault, for I cannot help it; it is my nature; and I could not prevent my having this nature; neither can I change it."

No man in the world is more prone to put things in people's mouths which they never said, or thought of, than Mr. J. W. I therefore lay very little stress on the testimony which supports the authenticity of this creed. It may be genuine. But it is more probable that it was forged and dressed up for the occasion.

However, I will bestow a few concise annotations on this confession of faith, be it real, or be it fictitious.

"All the evil in the world is owing to God." Nothing can be more false. For, as the great and good (p) Mr. Edwards observes, "It would be strange arguing indeed, because men never commit sin but only when God leaves them to themselves, and necessarily sin when he does so; that therefore their sin is not from themselves, but from God: and so, that God must be a sinful being. As strange as it would be to argue, because it is always dark when the sun is gone, and never dark when the sun is present, that therefore all darkness is from the sun, and that his disk and beams must needs be black." (Enquiry, p. 364, 365.)

Mr. Wesley's necessitarian adds: "I cannot blame that cur for barking and biting." But did the gentleman never so much as once in his life-time beat a cur for barking and biting? I dare say he has; and would again if a cur was to fly at him with open mouth. It should seem, therefore, that a cur, though he bark and bite necessarily, is liable still to blame; else how could he be justly entitled to blows?

"It is his nature." Most certainly. And yet you will beat him for it!

"He did not make himself." Who thinks he did?

"I feel wrong tempers in myself." I dare say you do.

"But that is not my fault." Certainly the fault is in yourself; and consequently the fault is your's. How you came by it is another matter; and belongs to the question of original sin.

"I cannot help it." Right: you cannot. But there is One that can. Apply to him.

"It is my nature." Very true.—"And I could not prevent my having this nature." I never imagined you could.—"Neither can I change it." I am very clear you cannot. The Æthiopian might as soon change his skin, or the leopard his spots, Jer. xiii. 23. And yet what will become of you if you die unchanged? May the Almighty put that cry into your heart, Turn thou me, and I shall be turned! for thou art the Lord my God. Jer. xxxi. 18. Then will you know what this meaneth: We all, with open face,

(p) Viz. the late Rev. Mr. Jonathan Edwards, of North America, whose Enquiry into the Freedom of the Will is a book which God has made the instrument of more deep and extensive usefulness (especially among deists, and persons of science,) than almost any other modern publication I know of. If such of my readers as have not yet met with it wish to see the Arminian sophistry totally unravelled and defeated, let them add that excellent performance to their literary treasures. A more nervous chain of reasoning it would be extremely difficult to find in the English language. Consequently it is not one of those treatises that can be run through in a hurry. It must be read deliberately, and weighed with attention; else you will lose half the strength of the connection.—A spruce Maccaroni was boasting one day that he had the most happy genius in the world. Every thing, said he, is easy to me. People call Euclid's Elements a hard book; but I read it yesterday from beginning to end in a piece of the afternoon, between dinner and tea-time. "Read all Euclid," answered a gentleman present, "in one afternoon! How was that possible?" "Upon my honour I did; and never read more smoother reading in my life." "Did you master all the demonstrations, and solve all the problems as you went?" "Demonstrations! and problems! I suppose you mean the a's, and b's, and c's, and l's, and 2's, and 3's; and the pictures of scratches and scrawls. No, no. I skip all they. I only read Euclid himself, and all Euclid I did read; and in one piece of the afternoon too."—Mr. Edwards must not be read so gently.

There are, it seems, two eminent defences of necessity which I have never yet seen: viz. Dr. Hartley's Observations on Man; and an anonymous Essay on Liberty and Necessity, published some years since, at Edinburgh. I hope I have a feast of pleasure and instruction in reserve. And it shall not be my fault if I do not soon enjoy it.

beholding as in a glass, the glory of the Lord; are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord. 2 Cor. iii. 18.

5. Mr. Wesley's wrath is not confined to the two gentlemen abovementioned. It strides back into the last century, and prosecutes "the assembly of divines who met at Westminster." For what offence are they thus dug out of their graves? For saying that "Whatever happens in time, was unchangeably determined from all eternity."—I beg leave to acquaint the court that there is a flaw in the charge. Mr. Wesley cannot quote even a single proposition, without mangling and altering!

In the confession drawn up by those divines, they express the matter thus: God, from all eternity, did, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatever comes to pass. Yet so, as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, &c. (g)—In their larger catechism they phrase it with no alteration of sense, as follows: God's decrees are the wise, free, and holy acts of the counsel of his will; whereby, from all eternity, he hath for his own glory unchangeably fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass in time: especially concerning angels and men.—In the shorter catechism they say: The decrees of God are his eternal purpose according to the counsel of his will; whereby, for his own glory, he hath fore-ordained whatever comes to pass. God executeth his decrees in the works of creation and providence.—I shall only observe, concerning all and each of these paragraphs, that if they be not true, the whole Bible is one grand string of falsehood from the first verse to the last.

While Mr. Wesley's hand was in, I wonder he did not arraign another assembly of divines, some of whom were mitred. I mean the famous assembly of bishops and others who met together, not many bow-shots from Westminster, on the Surrey side of the Thames, in the year 1595, at a certain place of rendezvous, called Lambeth Palace; where, says Dr. Fuller, "archbishop Whitgift, out of his Christian care to propagate the truth, and suppress the opposite errors, caused a solemn meeting of many grave and learned divines;" among whom, besides the good archbishop himself, were Bancroft, bishop of London; Vaughan, bishop of Bangor; Tindal, dean of Ely; Whitaker, Divinity Professor of Cambridge, &c., which said assembly of divines drew up the celebrated Lambeth articles; whereof I shall here cite but one for a specimen, having treated at large of this assembly and its determinations elsewhere; (r) "Prædestinatorum præfinitus et certus est numerus; qui nec augeri, nec minui, potest;" i. e. The number of the predestinated is fore-determined and certain, so that it can neither be increased nor diminished.

There have also been still larger assemblies of divines, composed of all the bishops, deans, and delegates of the clergy in England. Witness the assembly who drew up the XXXIX Articles, to which Mr. Wesley has, indeed, over and over again, set his hand; but with the same simplicity and godly sincerity, 2 Cor. i. 12, which seem to have actuated Dr. Reid, Dr. Oswald, and Dr. Beattie, when they subscribed the confession and catechism of the Westminster assembly.

There's such a thing as holy tricking;
Tests are but pie-crust, made for breaking.
Our own conveniency, and gains,
Are sweetmeats, which that crust contains.
To come at these, what man so foolish,
But would a thousand crusts demolish?

Moreover, what shall we say concerning that most reverend, right reverend assembly, who put that woeful collect into the liturgy beginning with, O God, whose never-failing providence ordereth all things in heaven and earth? Can any breathe more strongly the whole of what we mean by necessity? A providence, a never-failing providence, that ordereth not only some, but all things.—Yea, all things both in heaven and earth! In that one passage (and the church has very many others quite like unto it), "see necessity drawn at full length, and painted in the most lively colours."

6. It is curious to behold Arminians themselves forced, by stress of argument, to take refuge in the harbour of that necessity which, at other times, they so vehemently seek to destroy. "It is necessary," say they, "that man's will should be free; for without freedom the will were no will at all."

I pity the distressful dilemma to which they are driven. Should they say, it is not necessary for man's will to be free, they give up their whole cause at once. If they say (and say it they do) that it is necessary, yea, absolutely necessary for the will to be free, and that in its very nature it cannot but be free;—then, say I, upon that principle, these good people are free, with a liberty of necessity, and sheer necessity itself is the root and sap of all their boasted free-agency. In other words free-agency, themselves being judges, is only a ramification of necessity!

7. Though I have mentioned the following anecdote in a preceding publication, yet, by way of recompensing Mr. Wesley for the amusement he has afforded me, in publish-

(g) Humble advice of the assembly, &c. p. 10, 11 Edit. Lond. 1658. Quarto.

(r) In a Tract, entitled the Church of England vindicated from the Charge of Arminianism; and in my Historic Proof of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England.

ing the conversation of the two necessitarian gentlemen, whereof I have just given the reader an account: I also, in my turn, shall refer him to a very remarkable conversation which passed between a free-will gentleman and myself, June 21, 1774, in the neighbourhood of London, and in the presence of my friend, the Rev. Mr. Ryland.

"God does all he possibly can," said the Arminian philosopher, "to hinder moral and natural evil. But he cannot prevail. Men will not permit God to have his wish."—Then the Deity, answered I, must certainly be a very unhappy being.—"Not unhappy in the least." What! meet with a constant series of crosses; thwarted in his daily endeavours; disappointed of his wishes; disconcerted in his plan of operations; defeated of his intentions; embarrassed in his views; and actually overpowered every moment of every day by numberless of the creatures he has made; and yet be happy under all this incessant series of perplexing and mortifying circumstances? "Yes: for he knows that in consequence of the free-will with which he has endued his rational creatures, he himself must be disappointed of his wishes, and defeated of his ends; and that there is no help for it unless he had made us mere machines. He therefore submits to necessity, and does not make himself uneasy about it." (s)

Can any thing be more shockingly execrable than such a degrading and blasphemous idea of the ever blessed God; and consequently is not the doctrine of human self-determinability the most daring, the most inconsistent, the most false, the most contemptible, and the most atheistical tenet that ever was spawned by pride and ignorance in conjunction? A doctrine which, in running away from the true necessity, coins an impossible necessity of its own inventing; and, while it represents men as gods, sinks God far below the level of the meanest man!

(s) See a note subjoined to p. 5 of a Sermon, lately published by me, entitled, Free-will and Merit brought to the Test; or, Men not their own Saviours: where some of the horrible consequences, and of the gigantic inconsistencies, inseparable from this gentleman's theory, are pointed out.

(t) Take a specimen of the vitiated state to which the free-will gangrene has reduced the moral state of this Christian and reformed country, in the following admired lines, which are part of a very applauded entertainment, lately introduced on the English stage:

"With sport, love, and wine, fickle fortune defy;
Dull wisdom all happiness sours;
Since life is no more than a passage at best,
Let us strew the way over with flow'rs."

Is not the adorable Creator of the world the Governor of it too? Or has he only built a stage for fortune to dance upon? Does Almighty providence do no more than hold the distaff while contingency (i. e. while nothing) spins the threads, and wreathes them into a line for the first cause (very falsely so called if this be the case!) to wind upon his reel and turn to the best account he can? Arminians may affirm it: but God forbid that I should ever believe it.

For my own part I solemnly profess before God, angels, and men, that I am not conscious of my being endued with that self-determining power which Arminianism ascribes to me as an individual of the human species. Nay, I am clearly certain that I have it not. I am also equally certain that I do not wish to have it; and that, was it possible for my Creator to make me an offer of transferring the determination of any one event from his own will to mine, it would be both my duty and my wisdom to entreat that the sceptre might still remain with himself, and that I might have nothing to do in the direction of a single incident, or of so much as a single circumstance.

Mr. Wesley laments that necessity is "The scheme which is now adopted by not a few of the most sensible men in the nation;" I agree with him as to the fact; but I cannot deplore it as a calamity. The progress which that doctrine has of late years made, and is still making, in this kingdom, I consider as a most happy and prominent symptom that the divine goodness has yet abundant mercies in reserve for a church, the majority of whose reputed members have long apostatized from her essential principles; and for a country whose (t) morals have degenerated in proportion to the corruptions of its faith.

May the, Psalm cii. 13, set time be nigh at hand for our national recovery to the gospel and to virtue! Then shall God, even our own God, give us his blessing.

Was a religious and sensible foreigner, whether Protestant or Popish, Jew, Mahometan or Heathen, to be informed that such equally detestable and despicable sentiments as those are heard with rapture at the British theatres, and chorused with delight in numberless private companies in every part of the kingdom, would he not be inclined to set us down in general for a nation of epicurean Atheists, fitonly to swallow in the Circæan sty; quite lost to all religion, philosophy, virtue, and decency; and no otherwise entitled to the name of man, than by perpendicularity of shape, connected with the art of speaking!

"If prone to thought, our stature is our shame;
And man should blush, his forehead meets the skies."

A DISSERTATION
CONCERNING THE
SENSIBLE QUALITIES OF MATTER;
MORE ESPECIALLY CONCERNING COLOURS.

Judge not (κατ' ὄψιν) according to sight. JOHN VIII. 24.

WHEN I wrote the foregoing chapters, it was my intention to have taken no notice of Mr. Wesley's weak and puerile objections to the well established doctrine of sensible qualities; partly because what he observes (or rather what he has picked up from Dr. Reid and others) on this subject is so contemptibly frivolous as hardly to justify any serious animadversion, and partly, because I did not consider the subject itself as directly connected with the article of necessity.

But, on my reflecting that the aptitude of perceivable bodies to impress our senses with certain motions called sensations, and that the sensations so produced, together with the correspondent ideas which those sensations impart to, or excite in the mind; are all the result of necessary relation, and form an indissolubly combined chain of cause and effect: I determined to subjoin some enquiries concerning a branch of knowledge which, in this view of it, is not altogether foreign to the main argument of the preceding disquisitions.

By the senses, I mean those conduits or avenues to the brain through which the soul receives its ideas of objects extraneous to itself. No person need be reminded that these senses are five, viz. those of feeling, hearing, seeing, smelling, and tasting. It may perhaps be solidly affirmed, that in absolute strictness we have but one sense, precisely so called, viz., that of feeling, or perception at large; of which the remaining four are but so many exquisite modifications, or affections. I acquiesce, however, in the popular division of the senses into five.

The sensible qualities of extraneous objects are, properly, no more than "powers," as Mr. Locke justly terms them, viz., powers of producing such particular motions in our animal organs as have a native tendency to occasion correspondent perceptions in the soul, through the mediation of the nerves and brain: that is to say, extraneous objects have this effect when duly presented to the senses, and when the senses are in such a state as duly to receive the impressions naturally arising from the presence or application of those objects.

These powers, inherent in extraneous bodies, of producing such sensations in us, indisputably result from the figure, size, arrangement, and motion of the particles which constitute the bodies themselves. Which appears, among other considerations hence, that the same body, under different modes of corpuscular size, arrangement, motion, and figure, occasions different sensations in the organs, and conveys different ideas to the mind.

Now, these modal differences of arrangement, &c., are undoubtedly resident in their respective subjects, and may easily be conceived of as existable independently on us; i. e. they might be just what they are whether the bodies themselves, in which they obtain, were objected to our senses or not. But the effects of those combined modes (as colour, sound, flavour, scent, pleasure, and pain) are things purely relative; and absolutely require the concurrence of sense, in order to their having any kind or degree of positive existence. They are but potentially in their peculiar subjects, until those subjects become objects, by being actually exposed to, and by actually operating upon, the organs of a percipient being.

Thus there might have been tremulations in the atmosphere, through the impulse of one mass of matter upon another (primarily set in motion by the divine will), if no animal or sentient being had been created. But in that case, it is utterly inconceivable how those tremulations, though ever so violent, could have occasioned what we call sound. Again.—The disposition of certain surfaces to reflect, refract, and absorb the incident rays of light, might have been just what it now is, independently on the optic nerves of animals: but then no surface, however disposed, i. e. be its texture, reflections, refractions or absorptions, what they will, could have occasioned that ideal result which we term colour, without being opposed to the visual organ of an intelligent substance. And so on, through every species of sensible quality.

Hence there is nothing hyperbolic or extravagant; but all is no less strictly and soberly philosophical, than sublimely and elegantly poetical, in the following lines of Dr. Young:

"The senses, which inherit earth and heavens,
 Enjoy the various riches nature yields :
 Far nobler ! give the riches they enjoy,
 Give taste to fruits, and harmony to groves ;
 The radiant beams to gold, and gold's bright fire :
 Take in, at once, the landscape of the world,
 At a small inlet, which a grain might close,
 And half create the wondrous world they see.
 But for the magic organ's pow'ful charm,
 Earth were a rude, uncolour'd chaos still.
 Objects are but th' occasion : our's th' exploit.
 Our's are the cloth, the pencil, and the paint,
 Which nature's admirable picture draw,
 And beautify creation's ample dome.
 Like Milton's Eve, when gazing on the lake,
 Man makes the matchless image, man admires."

This is provable, not only by reason, but by numberless experiments. Do but artfully vary the medium through which you see it, and you may make the surface of any body whatever assume, in appearance, any colour you please, and that in the most rapid succession, and in every mode of possible diversity. A certain sign that colour is only a sensible quality, and not a real property of matter.

But let us hear Mr. Wesley : who wildly thinks himself no less qualified to demolish the fundamental axioms of natural philosophy, than to overturn the first principles of natural and revealed religion.

"Colour," says he, "is a real material thing. There is no illusion in the case, unless you confound the perception with the thing perceived (a). And all other secondary qualities are just as real, as figure, or any other primary one." With regard to colour (for I have neither room nor leisure to run through all the other secondary qualities), its non-existence is certain, not only from the preceding considerations, but likewise, in general, from the natural darkness of matter. Every atom (even those not excepted, which constitute that exquisite fluid, called light ; though it is the most attenuated and subtil body with which we are acquainted) is intrinsically dark, and consequently colourless. Light itself, by whose intervention other bodies become visible, seems to depend greatly, if not entirely, for that power, on the exility, the extreme rarefaction, and on the incomparably rapid motion, expansion, and protrudibility, of its component particles : by which properties it is peculiarly fitted to act upon the instruments of animal sight ; as these are likewise reciprocally fitted to admit that sensation, which Providence designed they should receive, in consequence of being so acted upon.

"All colours," says Mr. Wesley, "do as really exist without us, at trees, or corn, or heaven, or earth." He is welcome to enjoy a delusion which (like most of his other opinions) has not one sound argument for its support. But hear him again : "When I say that cloth is of a red colour ; I mean, its surface is so disposed as to reflect the red ; i. e. the largest rays of light. When I say, the sky is blue, I mean, it is so disposed as to reflect the blue, i. e. the smallest rays of light. And where is the delusion here ? Does not that disposition, do not those rays, as really exist, as either the cloth or the sky ? And are they not as really reflected as the ball in a tennis-court ?"

What, in the name of wonder, could induce Mr. W. to make these concessions ? Concessions which cut the throat of his own hypothesis from ear to ear ! for I appeal to any competent reader whether the following conclusions do not necessarily flow from those premises :

1. That colour is the mere creature of sensation : which sensation is occasioned (not by any real tinge inherent, either in the object, or in the rays of light, but occasioned) by the "disposition," i. e. by the texture or configuration and connection, of the superficial particles, and by the "largeness" or "smallness," i. e. by the size of the "reflected rays." This is all very right so far as it goes.

2. That "redness" and "blueness" (for instance) are mere ideas, resulting from the peculiarly "disposed surfaces" of the reflecting bodies, and from the magnitude or minuteness of the "rays" which those surfaces either strike back, or refract in various directions. And what is this but the very doctrine against which Mr. Wesley professedly draws his wooden sword ? For,

3. As to the real existence of bodies, and their surfaces, and rays of light ; it is not questioned by any I know of, except by the few followers of Bishop Berkeley ; and they are very few indeed. Not three dozen, I suppose, in the three kingdoms.

4. It follows, that Mr. Wesley's inconsistent assertion cannot, even on his own principles, be true ; viz., that "colour is a real material thing." No : it is an ideal thing ; generated in our minds by the "disposition" of "surfaces," and by the reverberation, &c. of "rays."

The Methodist goes on. "It is true, that when they" [i. e. when irradiated surfaces] "strike upon my eye, a particular sensation follows in my soul. But that sensation is not colour : I know no one that calls it so." Nor I neither. The sensation only gives at first, and repeatedly excites afterwards, the idea of colour. For, properly speaking, there is no such thing as absolute colour, either in the bodies themselves, or

(a) The plain natural meaning of this is, that "the thing perceived," viz. colour, considered as resident in bodies, "is real," but that our "perception" of that "real" colour is a mere "illusion!"—Without any "illusion" at all, may we not pronounce in the rays which they reflect, or in the eye, or in the soul. Yet is the idea founded on a complication of realities. For both the bodies, and the rays, and the eye, and the soul, have a positive existence.

Mr. Wesley to be the lamest, the blindest, and the most self-contradictory waster of ink and paper that ever pretended to the name of reasoner ? It is almost a disgrace to refute him.

But Mr. Wesley has a dreadful peal of thunder in reserve; which he thus rattles over the head of natural philosophy. "Take it altogether" [i. e. believe the sensible qualities to be no more than sensible], "What a supposition is this! Is it not enough to make one's blood run cold? The great God, the Creator of heaven and earth, the Father of the spirits of all flesh, the God of truth, has encompassed with falsehood every soul that he has made! Has given up all mankind to a strong delusion, to believe a lie! Yea, all his creation is a lie! You make God himself, rather than the devil, the father of lies!" — Mighty pious, mighty rhetorical, and mighty philosophical.

I shall leave the horrid criminality of this indecent passage to the cognizance of the adorable Being it blasphemes: and only observe that Mr. Wesley's heat and profaneness (of which he has elsewhere given innumerable samples) are such, that he dares to scold his Maker with as little ceremony, and with as much scurrility, as an enraged fish-woman would burden the ears of a 'prentice wench.

But let me ask: "Is God (I tremble even to put the question!) therefore "the father of lies," because he has not furnished us with acuteness of sight sufficient to take in the real magnitudes of the sun and other celestial bodies? Or can he be said to "encompass us with falsehood," because we do not perceive the annual and diurnal motions of the earth? Our senses tell us (and the far greater part of mankind, upon the credit of their senses, live and die in the belief) that the sun is not so large as a coach-wheel; that the moon is less than the dial of St. Paul's clock; that the diameter of the largest visible star is inferior to that of a tea-cup; and that the earth is absolutely quiescent, instead of constantly travelling (as in reality it does) at the rapid rate of about 60,000 miles an hour, exclusively of its diurnal rotation round its own axis. The illusions of colour, taste, and smell, are nothing when compared with the immense difference between appearances and facts, in these and other points of so much greater consequence. And hence it becomes the office of reason and science to rectify, so far as they can, the frequent mistakes of sense.

I shall add to these remarks a sketch of what Mr. Locke has observed, concerning the qualities called sensible. And I do this rather do this with some extent, because that profound and masterly genius has cultivated this part of science with a perspicuity and solidity equalled, I believe, by few other writers on the subject.

"It being manifest that there are multitudes of bodies, each whereof are so small, that we cannot, by any of our senses, discover either their bulk, figure, or motion, as is evident in the particles of air and water; and others extremely smaller than those, perhaps as much smaller than the particles of air and water, as the particles of air and water are smaller than peas or hail-stones; let us suppose, at present, that the different motions and figures, bulk and number, of such particles affecting the organs of our senses, produce in us those different sensations which we have from the colours and smells of bodies. Let us suppose, for example, that a violet, by the impulse of such insensible [i. e. invisible] particles of matter, of peculiar figures and bulks, and in different degrees and modifications of their motions, causes the ideas of the blue colour and sweet scent of that flower to be produced in our minds. It being no more impossible to conceive that God should annex such ideas to such motions with which they have no similitude, than that he should annex the idea of pain to the motion of a piece of steel dividing our flesh, with which that idea hath no resemblance.

"What I have said, concerning colours and smells, may be understood also of tastes and sounds, and other sensible qualities: which, whatever reality we by mistake attribute to them, are in truth nothing in the objects themselves, but powers to produce various sensations in us; and depend on the primary qualities, viz., bulk, figure, texture and motion of parts.

"Flame is denominated hot and bright; snow, white and cold; manna, white and sweet, from the ideas they produce in us. Whoever considers that the same fire which, at one distance, produces in us the sensation of warmth, does, at a nearer approach, produce in us the far different sensation of pain; ought to bethink himself what reason he has to say that his idea of warmth, which was produced in him by the fire, is actually in the fire; and his idea of pain which the same fire produced in him is not in the fire. Why are whiteness and cold in snow, and pain not; when it produces both one and the other of those ideas in us, and can do neither, but by the bulk, figure, number, and motion of its solid parts?

"The particular bulk, number, figure, and motion of the parts of fire or snow, are really in those bodies, whether any one's senses perceive them or no: and may therefore be called real qualities. But light, heat, whiteness, or coldness, are no more really in snow or fire, than sickness or pain is in manna. Take away the sensation of them; let not the eye see light or colours, nor the ear hear sounds; let the palate not taste, nor the nose smell; and all colours, tastes, odours, and sounds, as they are such particular ideas, vanish and cease, and are reduced to their causes, viz., bulk, figure, and motions of parts.

“Let us consider the red and white colours in porphyry [marble]. Hinder light but from striking on it, and its colours vanish; it no longer produces any such ideas in us. Upon the return of light it produces these appearances again. Can any one think that any real alterations are made in the porphyry by the presence or absence of light; and that those ideas of whiteness and redness are really in porphyry in the light, when it is plain it has no colour in the dark?

“It has, indeed, such a configuration of particles, both night and day, as are apt, by the rays of light rebounding from some parts of that hard stone, to produce in us the idea of redness, and from others the idea of whiteness; but whiteness and redness are not in it, at any time; but only such a texture as has power to produce such a sensation in us.

“Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be turned into a dirty one; and the sweet taste into an oily one. What real alteration can the beating of a pestle make in any body, but an alteration in the texture of it?

“He that will examine his complex idea of gold, will find several of the ideas that make it up to be only powers: as the power of being melted, but of not spending itself in the fire; and of being dissolved in aqua regia. Which are ideas as necessary to make up our complex idea of gold, as its colour and weight: which, if duly considered, are nothing but different powers. For, to speak truly, yellowness is not actually in gold, but is a power in gold to produce that idea in us, by our eyes, when placed in a due light. And the heat which we cannot leave out of our idea of the sun, is no more really in the sun than is the white colour which it introduces into wax. These are both equally powers in the sun, operating by the motion and figure of its insensible parts, so on a man as to make him have the idea of heat; and so on wax, as to make it capable to produce in a man the idea of white.

“Had we senses acute enough to discern the minute particles of bodies, and the real constitution on which their sensible qualities depend, I doubt not, but they would produce quite different ideas in us and that which now [seems] the yellow colour of gold would then disappear, and instead of it, we should see an admirable texture of parts of a certain size and figure.

“This microscopes plainly discover to us. For what, to our naked eyes, produces the [semblance of] a certain colour, is, by thus augmenting the acuteness of our senses, discovered to be quite a different thing: and the thus altering, as it were, the proportion of the bulk of the minute parts of a coloured object to our sight, produces different ideas from what it did before.

“Thus sand or pounded glass, which is opaque and white to the naked eye, is pellucid in a microscope. And a hair, seen this way, loses its former colour, and is in a great measure pellucid, with a mixture of bright, sparkling colours, such as appear from the refraction of diamonds, and other pellucid bodies. Blood, to the naked eye, appears all red: but by a good microscope, wherein its lesser parts appears, shews only some few globules of red, swimming in a pellucid liquor. And how those red globules would appear, if glasses could be found that could magnify them yet 1000, or 10,000 times more is uncertain.” (b)

No dishonour will accrue to this great man, now so largely quoted, by observing, that in what he so ably delivered concerning the secondary or sensible qualities of matter, he stood on the shoulders of his illustrious fore-runner in science, Mr. Boyle.—Permit me, at once, to enrich the present appendix with a few paragraphs from this last-mentioned philosopher; and to confirm its general drift by the sanction of so exalted an authority.

“I do not deny that bodies may be said, in a very favourable sense, to have those qualities [potentially] which we call sensible, though there were no animals in the world. For a body, in that case, may have such a disposition of its constituent corpuscles, that, if it were duly applied to the sensory of an animal, it would produce such a sensible [effect], which a body of another texture would not. Thus, though, if there were no animals, there would be no such thing as pain; yet a [thorn] may, upon account of its figure, be fitted to cause pain, in case it were moved against a man's finger: whereas, a blunt body, moved against it with no greater force, is not fitted to cause any such perception. So snow, though if there were no lucid body nor organ of sight in the world, would exhibit no colour at all (for I could not find it had any in places exactly darkened); yet hath it a greater disposition than a coal or soot to reflect store of light outwards, when the sun shines upon them all three. We say that a lute is in tune, whether it be actually played upon or no, if the strings be all so duly stretched as that it would appear to be in tune, if it were played on.

“Thrust a pin into a man's finger both before and after his death. Though the pin be as sharp at one time as at another; and makes, in both cases alike, a solution of continuity; yet, in the former case, the action of the pin will produce pain : and not in the latter, because in this, the pricked body wants the soul, and consequently, the perceptive faculty.—So, if there were no sensitive beings, those bodies, which are now the objects of our senses, would be no more than dispositively endued with colours, tastes, and the like : but actually with only the more catholic affections of bodies, as figure, motion, texture, &c.

“To illustrate this yet a little farther. Suppose a man should beat a drum at some distance from the mouth of a cave, conveniently situated to return the noise he makes. People will presently conclude that the cave has an echo ; and will be apt to fancy, upon that account, some (c) real property in the place, to which the echo is said to belong. Yet, to speak physically of things, this peculiar quality or property which we fancy to be in the cave, is in it, nothing else but the hollowness of its figure, whereby it is so disposed as, when the air beats against it, to reflect the motion towards the place whence that motion began. And what passes on the occasion is indeed but this : the drumstick, falling on the drum, makes a percussion of the air, and puts that fluid body in an undulating motion ; and the aerial waves, thrusting on one another, until they arrive at the hollow superficies of the cave, have by reason of its resistance and figure, their motion determined the contrary way : namely, backward, towards that part where the drum was when it was struck. So that in that which here happens, there intervenes nothing but the figure of one body and the motion of another : though if a man's ear chance to be in the way of these motions of the air forward and backward, it gives him a perception of them which he calls sound.

“And whereas one body doth often seem to produce in another, divers such qualities as we call sensible ; which qualities therefore seem not to need any reference to our senses ; I consider that, when one inanimate body works upon another, there is nothing really produced by the agent, in the patient, save some local motion of its parts, or some change of texture consequent upon that motion : but by means of its effects upon our organs of sense, we are induced to attribute this or that quality to it. So, if a piece of transparent ice be, by the falling of some heavy and hard body upon it, broken into a gross powder that looks whitish ; the falling body doth nothing to the ice but break it into very small fragments, lying confusedly upon one another : though by reason of the fabric of the world and of our eyes, there does, in the day-time, upon this comminution, ensue such a kind of copious reflection of the incident light to our eyes as we call whiteness. And when the sun, by thawing this broken ice, destroys its whiteness, and makes it become diaphanous, which it was not before ; the sun does no more than alter the texture of the component parts, by putting them into motion, and thereby into a new order : in which, by reason of the disposition of the intercepting pores, they reflect but few of the incident beams of light, and transmits most of them.

“When you polish a rough piece of silver, that which is really done is but the depression of the little protuberant parts into one level with the rest of the superficies : though, upon this mechanical change of the texture of the superficial parts, we men say, that it hath lost the quality of roughness and acquired that of smoothness ; because, whereas the extances did before, by their figure, resist a little the motion of our finger, our finger now meets with no such offensive resistance.

“Fire will make wax flow, and enable it to burn a man's hand. And yet this does not argue in it any inherent quality of heat, distinct from the power it hath of putting the small parts of the wax into such a motion as that their agitation surmounts their cohesion. But though we suppose the fire to do no more than variously and briskly to agitate the insensible parts of the wax, that may suffice to make us think the wax endued with a quality of heat ; because, if such agitation be greater than that of our organs of touch, it produces in us the sensation we call heat : which is so much a relative to the sensory which apprehends it, that the same luke-warm water (i. e. water whose corpuscles are moderately agitated by the fire) will seem hot to one of a man's hands, if that hand be very cold, and cold to the other, in case it be very hot ; though both of them be the same man's hand. Bodies, in a world constituted as our's now is, being brought to act upon the most curiously contrived sensories of animals, may, upon both these accounts, exhibit many different sensible phenomena : which, however we look upon them as distinct qualities, are but the consequent effects of the often-mentioned catholic affections of matter, and deducible from the size, shape, motion (or rest), posture, order, and the resulting texture of the insensible parts of bodies. And therefore, though, for shortness of speech, I shall not scruple to make use of the word qualities, since it is already so generally received ; yet I would

(c) Real properties it undoubtedly has ; and it is impossible that any portion of matter should be without them. But sr. Boyle means, that the particular effect which we term sound, is not of the number of those real properties, but merely sensitive and ideal ; and become so, when matter, under certain modes and circumstances of figure and motion, is objected to, and operates upon the suitably disposed organ of a perceiving animal.

be understood to mean it in a sense suitable to the doctrine above delivered." (d)

But there is one consideration which, in my view of it, decides the question absolutely and irrefragably. To wit, the essential sameness of matter in all bodies whatever.

The opinion that what are commonly termed the four elements (viz., earth, water, air, and fire) are so many simple and essentially different principles, or absolute and first rudiments, seems to me an exceedingly erroneous supposition. For I take those elements, as they are usually styled to be, themselves, but so many various modifications of that same simple matter, whereof all body or extended substance, without exception, consists. (e)

Now, if it be allowed that all matter is panded into water, or rarified into air.—Which reminds me,

3. Of the continual transmutation of one modified substance into another, by the chemical process of nature; sometimes assisted, but oftener quite unassisted, by art; which literal metamorphosis seems to be a grand and fundamental law of this lower world; and if admitted, furnishes me with an additional argument for the sameness of matter under all its vast variety of modes and forms.

We may, for example, ask with the poet:

"Where is the dust that has not been alive?
The spade, and plough, disturb our ancestors:
From human mould we reap our daily bread:
The moist of human frame the sun exhales:
Winds scatter through the mighty void, the dry:
Earth re-possesses part of what she gave."

And thus the mysterious wheel of nature goes round; the vast mechanic circulation is kept up; and by a wonderful but real επιερχομενοις, well-nigh every thing (I speak of matter only) becomes every thing in its turn.

So thoroughly persuaded am I, in my own mind, that all the atoms, particles, and larger portions of matter are primarily and intrinsically and essentially homogeneous; that I make no doubt but a millstone is physically capable of being rarified into light, and light physically capable of being condensed into a millstone. By the way, light is, perhaps, no more than melted air; and air is, perhaps, the never-failing reservoir which supplies the sun with materials for its rays. Air is, incontestably, a necessary pabulum of sublunary, and why not of solar, fire!

I shall conclude this excursive note with a pertinent passage from Mr. Boyle, in which that profound and judicious naturalist informs us, on the authority of an experiment made by himself, that even water is ultimately convertible into oil, and into fire.

"Since the various manner of the coalition of several corpuscles into one visible body is enough to give them a peculiar texture, and thereby fit them to exhibit divers sensible qualities, and to become a body, sometimes of one denomination, and sometimes of another; it will very naturally follow, that from the various (but providential) occurrences of these innumerable swarms of little bodies that are moved to and fro in the world, there will be many fitted to stick to one another, and so compose concretions; and many (though not in the self-same place) disjoined from one another, and agitated apart. And multitudes also that will be driven to associate themselves, now with one body, and presently with another.

"And if we also consider, on the one side, that the sizes of the small particles may be very various, their figures almost innumerable; and that if a parcel of matter do but happen to stick to one body, it may give it a new quality; and, if it adhere to another, or hit against some of its parts, it may constitute a body of another kind; or if a parcel of matter be knocked off from another, it may barely by that, leave it, and become itself of another nature than before: if, I say, we consider these things on the one side, and on the other side, that (to use Lucretius's comparison) all the innumerable multitude of words which are contained in all the languages of the world, are made of the various combinations of the twenty-four letters of the alphabet; it will not be hard to conceive that there may be an incomprehensible variety of associations and textures of the minute parts of bodies, and consequently a vast multitude of portions of matter endued with store enough of different qualities, to deserve distinct appellations, though, for want of heedfulness and fit words, men have not yet taken so much

(d) Boyle's Origin of Forms and Qualities, p. 31—38. Edit. Oxf. 1667.

(e) Without entering either deeply or extensively into the considerations which determine me to this belief, I would barely offer the following hints.

1. To imagine that Infinite Wisdom would multiply essences without reasonable cause, were to foster an hypothesis directly contrary to that beautiful simplicity which so evidently, and so universally, characterises the variegated works of God. Nature (i. e. Omnipotence behind the curtain) is radically frugal, though its phenomena exhibit almost an infinity of modal diversification. Two essences only (viz. spirit and matter) are fully sufficient to account for every appearance, and to answer every known purpose of creation, and of providence. What occasion, then, for five? or, as some suppose, for no fewer than seven? viz., earth, water, air, fire, light, ether and spirit)? Might we not just as rationally dream of seventy, or even seventy millions of essences?

Sir Isaac Newton's rule for philosophising, and the argument on which he grounds it strike me with all the force of self-evidence: Causas rerum naturalium non plures admitti debere, quam quæ et vere sint, et earum phaenomenis explicandis sufficient. Dicunt utique philosophi: Natura nihil agit frustra; et frustra, per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora. Natura enim simplex est, et rerum causis superfluis non luxuriat. If this be just, the admission of more essences than two would be totally inconsistent with a first and fundamental principle of all natural knowledge.

2. The four classes of matter, commonly called Elements, are in reality not simple, but exceedingly compound bodies; and partake very much of each other. Which circumstance forms no inconsiderable branch of that αταξια, or confusion, literally so termed, introduced by original sin. Thus,

Earth associates to itself all the solvable substances that are committed to its bosom. Which substances, after the time respectively requisite for their solution, and for their co-alescence with the earth, are not distinguishable from original earth itself.

Water is known to comprehend every species of earthy particles; as well as to include no small portion of air: and to be capable, by motion, of assuming that quality which we term heat; even in such a degree as to be no less intolerable by animals than flame itself.

Air is constantly intermingled with an immense number of dissimilar particles. With household dust (for instance), which is, in fact, the wearings of almost every thing. Not to mention the countless effluvia, with which the atmosphere is charged, incessantly flying off from animal bodies both sound and putrescent; and from the whole world of vegetable substances both fragrant and foetid. These particles, through the continual attrition occasioned by their motion and interference with each other, and by the ambient pressure of the air upon them all, undergo, it is probable, a gradual atomic separation; and, when sufficiently comminuted, become, at last, a genuine part of that aerial fluid in which they only floated before.—Could we breathe nothing but pure unmixed air, human health and life would, probably, extend to an extreme length.

Fire, or more properly a fiery substance, will burn (i. e. communicate a portion of its own motion to) and assimilate all other contracting bodies, whose corpuscular co-hesion is not sufficiently close and firm to resist the subtil agency of that insinuating power. But, when its force is exhausted (i. e. when the intestine agitation of its parts has forced off all that was volatile, and ceases in consequence of having no more to do), what remains? A quantity of particles equal y capable (for ought that appears to the contrary) of being condensed into earth, or ex-essentially the same, under every possible diversity of appearance: it will follow, that what we call sensible qualities are rather modal discriminations than real differences.

Let us apply this doctrine to colours.

Several necessary pre-requisites must concur to impress my mind, at first, with an idea of colour. 1. There must be the presence of a visible object: 2. The surface of that object must have a certain disposition, texture, or construction of parts: 3. Rays of light must fall towards, and be returned from, that surface: 4. My organs of sight must (1.) be of such a structure, and (2.) be in so sound a state, as duly to admit the impression naturally resulting from the above complication of circumstances. Who that considers all this, can doubt a moment, whether the idea of colour, with which my mind is affected, on its perception of an object, depend as absolutely on the structure and on the state of my eyes, as on the superficial disposition and illumination of the object itself? Yea, it depends much more on the former than on the latter. For, as it has lately been well argued, "If all mankind had jaundiced eyes, they must have been under a necessity of concluding that every object was tinged with yellow: and indeed, according to this new system" [viz., the system which supposes that bodies are of the colour they seem to be of], "it would then have been so; not in appearance only, but also in reality!" (f)

Besides, was it to be granted that "colour is a real material thing;" such concession would naturally engender a farther mistake, viz., that at least those seven colours which are denominated original ones, and which appear so very different from each other, are in fact so many different essences. But as this conclusion, though forcibly deducible from the premise, would be fraught with absurdities neither few nor small, we may fairly suspect the premise itself to be untrue.

An objection was lately started in private company against the doctrine which maintains the universal sameness of matter, as if, upon this hypothesis, it would follow that, "All bodies and all qualities of bodies are equally estimable." Nothing, however, can be more frivolous than such a supposition. It might as plausibly be alleged that "Because all actions, considered as actions, are exertions of power, therefore all actions are equally good." Whereas the modes and effects of action occasion such vast relative differences in actions themselves, that a man of common understanding and virtue cannot long hesitate what species of action to approve. Thus it is with regard to bodies and semblances. For,

"Tho' the same sun, with all-diffusive rays,
Blush in the rose, and in the diamond blaze;
We prize the stronger effort of his pow'r;
And justly set the gem above the flow'r."

If a philosophic lady visits a mercer's shop with a view to select the brightest silk it affords, the fair customer will be naturally led to fix her choice on that whose colourings appear, to her, the most elegant and vivid; though she knows that those colourings are illusive, and that, in reality, there is no such thing as absolute colour at all.

In short, we are so constituted as to receive much more delectable ideas from some semblances, and from some combinations of semblances, than from others. And we, with very good reason, like or dislike accordingly. Though were our organs contrarily fabricated to what they are, the same objects which now give us pleasure, would be sources of pain; and what we now relish as desirable, and admire as beautiful, would strike us as disgusting and deformed.

How often are pleasures and pains generated by imaginary considerations! and yet those pains and pleasures are as real, and sometimes still more poignant and exquisite than if they were justly founded.

Dr. Dodderidge has some concise observations on the secondary qualities of bodies, much to the purpose of my general argument. "The same external qualities in objects may excite different ideas in different persons.

"1. If the organs of sensation be at all different, the ideas of the same object must be proportionably so while the same laws of nature prevail.

"2. It is probable, there may be some notice of their less obvious varieties, as to sort them as they deserve, and give them distinct and proper names.

"So that, though I would not say that any thing can immediately be made of every thing; as a gold ring of a wedge of gold; or oil, or fire, of water; yet since bodies, having but one common matter, can be differentiated but by accidents [i. e. by modes and circumstances not essential to their nature as parts of matter at large] which seem, all of them, to be the effects and consequents of local motion: I see not why it should be absurd to think that (at least among inanimate bodies), by the intervention of some very small addition or subtraction of matter (which yet, in most cases, will not be needed), and of an orderly series of alterations, disposing, by degrees, the matter to be transmuted, almost of any thing may at length be made any thing.

"So, though water cannot, immediately, be transmuted into oil, and much less into fire; yet if you nourish certain plants with water alone, as I have done, until they have assimilated a great quantity of water into their own nature, you may by committing this transmuted water (which you may distinguish and separate from that part of the vegetable you first put in) to distillation in convenient glasses, obtain, besides other things, a true oil, and a black combustible coal (and consequently fire); and of which may be so copious as to leave no just cause to suspect that they could be any thing near afforded by any little spirituous parts, which may be presumed to have been communicated by that part of the vegetable that is first put into the water, to that far greater part of it which was committed to distillation."

Origin of Forms, &c. p. 61—63.

(f) Dr. Priestley's Exam. of Beattie, &c. p. 143.

degree of difference in the organs of different persons. For instance: in the distance of the retina and crystalline humour of the eye; in the degree of extension in the tympanum of the ear; in the acrimony of the saliva, &c. And the variety which is observable in the faces, the voices, and the bones of men, and almost through the whole face of nature, would lead us to suspect that the same variety might take place here.

“3. Those things which are very pleasing to one, are extremely disagreeable to another.

“4. Those things which are, at one time, very agreeable, are, at another, very disagreeable, to the same person, when the organs of his body are indisposed, or when other disagreeable ideas are associated with those that had once been grateful. (g)

Thus, as Mr. Boyle remarks, “some men whose appetites are gratified by decayed cheese, think it then not to have degenerated, but to have attained its best state, when, having lost its former colour, and smell, and taste, and, which is more, being in great part turned into those insects called mites; it is both, in a philosophical sense, corrupted, and, in the estimation of the generality of men, grown putrid.” (h)

It is well known that some persons have literally fainted, not only at the continued sight of the above-mentioned viand, whether decayed or sound; but (which evinces the antipathy to be unaffected) even when the offending substance has been totally concealed from the view of the unsuspecting guest by those who have purposely tried the brutal and inhospitable experiment.—Others will be convulsed at the approach of a cat.—And I have heard of a gentleman who would swoon at the presence of a cucumber, properly cut and prepared for the table.

Now whence is it, that what eminently gratifies the senses of one individual shall thus have a reverse effect on those of another? Certainly not from any difference in the object: for both the substance and the attributes of that remain precisely the same, whether the perceptions which they occasion in us be pleasing or offensive. Consequently, if one and the same object operate in so contrary a manner on the sensitive organs of various people, the diversity of effect, where it really obtains, must be owing to a modal variation in the mechanical structure of the sensitive organs themselves.

I consider it, therefore, as equally ungenerous and absurd, when particular aversions, seem they ever so odd, are hastily blamed and ridiculed. They may be, and very frequently are, constitutional and insuperable.

The elegant sex, especially, are often savagely censured on these accounts. If a lady turn pale when it thunders, or start from a spider, or tremble at a frog, or shriek at the high appearance of a mouse; I cannot in common justice laughingly exclaim, with Dean Swift,

“If chance a mouse creep in her sight,
She finely counterfeits a fright:
So sweetly screams, if it come near her,
It ravishes all hearts to hear her.”

Such antipathies are not always to be classed under the article of affectation, nor even of prejudice. They frequently arise, particularly in females, and in very young persons, from the extreme delicacy of their nervous and organic systems.

I smiled, indeed, on a lady's once saying to me, I have just paid a morning's visit to Mrs. G———; and really thought I should have fainted away, on seeing the cloth laid for dinner at so shocking an hour as one o'clock. This, I confess, struck me at first, as the language, not of real, but assumed, elegance, and I treated it accordingly, by hoping that “in all her future visits to Mrs. G———, she would previously arm herself with a smelling bottle, for fear of consequences.” I will not, however, be too peremptory in denying that the sight of a table-cloth, displayed at an hour deemed so “shockingly” unseasonable, might literally excite some, though not an insupportable degree of painful vibration in the nerves of so refined a person.

A few other familiar illustrations of our main point shall close the present disquisition.

We will imagine a gentleman to be, as we commonly phrase it, violently in love. That is: the charms, or assemblage of sensible qualities, in a particular lady, are exactly adapted to strike with rapture a system of senses so fabricated as his, and, of course, to fall in with his ideas of beauty, merit, and accomplishment.—What is the consequence? He becomes her captive, and can no more avoid becoming such, than an aspin leaf can resist the impulse of the zephyr. Hence she is necessarily considered by him as a Helen, a Venus, a Pansebia.

“Grace is in all her steps: heaven in her eye;
In every gesture, dignity and love.”

And yet this self-same lady may appear far less attracting, or but barely passable, or perhaps in some respects, even homely and disagreeable, to the eyes of another man.—Why? Because our ideas depend upon our senses: and our senses depend upon their own interior conformation for the particular cast and mode of every perception which is impressed upon them from without. Hence it is a common phrase, concerning a man who has never been in love, that he has not seen the right object. And nothing can be more philosophically true.

(g) Dodderidge's Lectures, p. 15.

(h) Origin of Forms, &c. p. 50.

A lady too, may be totally and inextricably captivated. When this is the case, the happy swain shines, in her estimation, a Narcissus, an Adonis, a Phœbus. Nor are the virtues of his mind distanced by the charms of his person. Other gentlemen may have their moral excellencies: but he, the incomparable he, is “More just, more wise, more learned, more everything.”

While, perhaps, a great part of her acquaintances shall unite to wonder, very seriously, what she could possibly see in this imaginary sanspareil; and even lift up their hands at her monstrous indelicacy of taste.

Parental affection, likewise, affords obvious and striking proof of the theory for which I have been pleading.

“Where yet was ever found a mother,
Who’d give her booby for another?
No child is half so fair and wise!
She sees wit sparkle in its eyes.”

Very probably. And it is also very possible that she may be the only person in the world who is able to discern any such thing. An acquaintance, or an occasional visitant, so far from agreeing with the enraptured parent, would perhaps cry out, if politeness did not prohibit, concerning the sweet little dear who passes for the “very image of his papa and mama,”

“Where are the father’s mouth and nose?
And mother’s eyes as black as sloes?
See here a shocking awkward creature,
That speaks the fool in every feature!”

Different people see the same things differently.—And thus, as Mr. Melmoth writes to his friend: “Though we agree in giving the same names to certain visible appearances; as whiteness, for instance, to snow; yet it is by no means demonstration, that the particular body, which affects us with that sensation, raises the same precise idea in any two persons who should happen to contemplate it together. I have often heard you mention your youngest daughter as being the exact counterpart of her mother. Now she does not appear to me to resemble her in any single feature. To what can this disagreement in our judgments be owing, but to a difference in the structure of our organs of sight?” (i)

What shall we say of self-love? How many noble and delightful sensible qualities does a man of this cast really believe himself to possess; most, if not all, of which are absolutely invisible to every other being.

(i) Fitz-Osborne’s Letters, Vol. I. Let. 34.

(k) In setting Mr. Wesley at the head of these self-admiring gentlemen, I by no means intend to insinuate that he stands on a level with the lowest of them in any one article, that of vanity and conceit alone excepted. Mistake me not, therefore, as though I meant to put him absolutely into the company of such men as Paracelsus, Scaliger, Bentley, and Aretin.

“What fine fingers I have!” said a lady once, in my hearing, “how beautifully the joints are turned!” Undoubtedly she thought so. But doctors differ. Not only the articulation of her fingers, but the construction of her whole hand, seemed to me rather clumsy than elegant. The same lady, by the way, actually thought herself sinless. But herein, likewise, I could not help dissenting from her judgment.

A vain man is, generally, still vainer than the vainest female. Mr. John Wesley, for example, declares himself to be “the greatest minister in the world.” I do him the justice to believe that, in permitting this declaration to pass the press, his avowed vanity was the honest trumpeter of his heart! But how few others will subscribe to his opinion! There is more learning in one hair of my head, said the self-enamoured Paracelsus, than in all the universities together. Who ever questioned herein the sincerity of that prattling empiric? But who does not more than question the reality of those great qualities on which he so extravagantly and so ridiculously valued himself?—When a bookseller, desirous to prefix an engraving of Julius Scaliger to one of that critic’s publications, requested him to sit for a likeness, Julius modestly answered, If the artist can collect the several graces of Massinissa, of Xenophon, and of Plato, he may then be able to give the world some faint idea of my person. If Scaliger was in love with his own outward man, Dr. Richard Bentley was no less so with his own intellectual improvements. Mr. Wasse, said the doctor very gravely, will be the greatest scholar in England when I am dead.—Peter Aretin had a medal struck, at his own expense, exhibiting his own profile; encircled with this humble inscription: il divinno Aretino, i. e. the divine Aretin. (k) When I reflect on such instances of self-idolatry as these, they remind me of Congreve’s observation:

“If happiness in (l) self content is plac’d
The wise are wretched, and fools only blest.”

We have taken a survey of love in more of its terminations than one. Let us for a moment advert to its opposite.

In revolving the description which the celebrated Dr. John Ponet, Bishop of Winchester, has given us of his Popish predecessor in that see, I have been prone to surmise that the latter might really appear as hideously frightful, in the eyes of the former, as the following written picture represents him to have done. “This doctor,” says

(l) “True happiness, however, is not placed in “self content,” but arises from a comfortable apprehension of our reconciliation to God by the blood and righteousness of his Son. Hence, a good man shall be satisfied [not with, but] from himself: Prov. xiv. 14, viz. from within: or from the inward testimony of the Holy Spirit witnessing to his conscience that he is a child of God. Rom. viii. 16.

Bishop Ponet, speaking of Stephen Gardiner, "has a swart colour, hanging look, frowning brows, eyes an inch within his head, a nose hooked like a buzzard; nostrils like a horse, ever snuffing into the wind; a sparrow mouth, great paws like the devil's, talons on his feet, like a gripe [i. e. like a griffin], two inches longer than natural toes; and so tied to with sinews that he cannot abide to be touched, nor scarce suffer them to touch the stones. And nature, having thus shaped the form of an old monster, gave him a vengeable wit, which, at Cambridge, by labour and diligence, he made a great deal worse; and brought up many in that faculty."<sup>(m)</sup> Such was Bishop Gardiner, according to Bishop Ponet's view of him. Notwithstanding which, this identical Gardiner might seem, in his own eyes, and in the eyes of Queen Mary and others of his friends, a portly personable prelate.

To be serious. Let me, by way of needful and sincere apology, for a disquisition which has extended to an unexpected length, observe that, in sifting the question, it was necessary to recur to first principles, and to survey the argument in various points of view. Let me, moreover, add: that in all I have delivered on the subject, I do but express my own sense of it, without the least aim of dictating to others, or of presumptuously seeking to obtrude my philosophic (any more than my religious) creed on such persons as may honour these pages with perusal.

Upon the whole, I conclude with Mr. Locke; (<sup>n</sup>) that the infinitely wise Contriver of us, and of all things about us, has fitted our senses, faculties, and organs, to the conveniences of life, and to the business we have to do. Such a knowledge as this, which is suited to our present condition, we want not faculties to attain. But, were our senses altered, and made much quicker and acuter, the appearances and outward scheme of things would have quite another face to us: and, I am apt to think, would be inconsistent with our being, or at least well-being in this part of the universe which we inhabit."

(m) Biog. Dict. vol. v. p. 307. Article, Gardiner.

(n) Essay on Und. book ii. chap. 23.

COLLECTION OF LETTERS.

THE following Letters were written by the author without the least view to publication, but soon after his decease, by the advice of friends, some of them were deemed proper to be printed. It should have been notified at the time, that they were sudden thoughts committed to paper without correction. For in a book that the rough draught of the letters were inserted, a memorandum was made verbatim, as follows:

"In looking among some old papers, I met with the copies of a few letters, which I had formerly written, and which I designed to enter, either in this or some other plain paper book, by way of preserving them, for my own future satisfaction, if Providence should please to preserve my life.

"The finding of those suggested to me the hint of taking foul copies of such letters as are any way interesting. I may, hereafter, write to particular friends, before I draw them out fair for the post. If I live, they may be of use to myself; if not, they can do me no hurt."

A. T.

Broad Hembury, Oct. 1. 1772.

The chief value of this collection lies in the exhibition it gives of the distinguished merit, and pious occupation that followed the writer of them in his private correspondence. They are interspersed with several observations on religion and human life, and shew a heart penetrated with truth endeavouring to persuade others, accompanied with sprightliness of wit, solidity of judgment, extent of knowledge, and elegance of taste, joined with all the undefinable ease and familiarity of the most unreserved conversation, which takes off that insipidness of a laboured stiffness that often attends the epistolary intercourse of many very sensible persons. EDITOR.

LETTER I.

MR. E.

Fen Ottery, March 6, 1767.

EVER DEAR SIR,

WILL my honoured friend forgive me if, from a kind impatience to be informed of his welfare, I take the liberty to enquire how he does? Though writing letters is one of the things which, in general, I am least fond of, yet I cannot forbear, dear sir, to present you and Mrs. — with my respects, and to wish you the joys of believing, and the comforts of the Holy Spirit. I have been returned into Devonshire about a fortnight: Mr. — is at London, attending the service of Parliament; so that I cannot very readily get my letter franked. I am glad, notwithstanding, that he is absent, as he was one of the two hundred and six members who, this day se'night, carried the vote for the reduction of the land tax, in opposition (as he writes me word) to one hundred and eighty-eight, who were for keeping it up to four shillings. But, to come to matters of infinitely greater importance, I hope, sir, you are enabled to trust your soul to Christ, and to cast your care on God. Satan, no doubt, will be ever ready to bring in the indictment, and conscience cannot help pleading guilty to a great part of the charge: but remember that your Judge is at the very same time your Advocate and Saviour. He is a lover of your soul, and was the propitiation for your sins; they cannot be too numerous, nor too heinous, for mercy like his to pardon, nor for merit like his to cover. Only flee to him for refuge, fly to the hiding place of his righteousness, death and intercession, and then the enemy can have no final advantage over you, nor the son of wickedness approach to hurt you in your everlasting interest. Assault you he may, in your way to the kingdom of God; overcome you he cannot, if you look, or desire to look, to Jesus for safety; lie at his blessed feet for protection, lay hold on his victorious cross for salvation, and then you shall find him gracious to relieve, mighty to deliver, and faithful to uphold. Cast anchor on his love, and be happy, rely on his omnipotence, and be safe. He knows that you are very near my heart, that not a day passes in which I do not beseech him on your behalf: may his Holy Spirit diffuse his heavenly peace throughout your soul; make you be joyful with his holy visitations, and while he comforts you from on high, sanctify you to the uttermost! In life, in death, in eternity, may he be your light, your strength, and your exceeding great reward! I know that your health is so bad you cannot read much, but you can pray; you can send up your desires, as incense, to the throne of God, almost every moment. As you sit, as you walk, as you take an airing, you may cultivate an intimacy with heaven; you may carry on a correspondence with God, you may hold silent intercourse with the Spirit of grace. Every sigh, if directed to him, is a prayer; every tear shed for sin is a sort of oblation, acceptable to him in Christ, and shall be noted in his book. Yet not the sighs we breathe, nor the tears we pour, are our justifying merit; but the sigh, the tears, the obedience, the death, of his co-eternal Son; his are the propitiations, ours are the memorial, and the proof of the work of grace which his Spirit begins in the soul. Resign yourself to his will in every dispensation; lie passive in his hand, stir not from his footstool, take all your spiritual distresses as commissioned from him. The cup, the medicinal cup, is of his mixing; the chastisement is the chastisement of a father, who loves while he strikes, and whose seeming wrath is real mercy. May his everlasting arms be spread beneath you; may his grace (as I doubt not it will) be sufficient for you, may his presence be with you, with yours, and with your affectionate servant in him,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. From my earnest desire to have you manage every one of your affairs in such a way as may most conduce to the peace of your own mind and the welfare of your family; I cannot help requesting leave to suggest a hint which, was my regard for you less than it is, I should certainly suppress; it is, my dear sir, in relation to Mrs. —, and your two youngest sons: with respect to Mrs. —, God forbid that you should leave her dependent, either for habitation, or for maintenance, on your children, or any body else. If you are not quite clear as to these two points, do let me beseech you to revise your papers, and if there is any deficiency in either of these respects, set it right while providence, by prolonging your life, continues it in your power. Indeed, and indeed, you will not discharge your duty without it; nor can you expect to depart in peace if you omit it. With regard to your two youngest sons, let me entreat you to leave them equally; they have both the same right to your affection, and to what you may design to give. Their aunt's kind intentions ought to make no difference as to this point: it is incumbent on you, my dear sir, to do your duty, and by that means Mrs. — will be left (as she ought to be) at full liberty to bestow her favours on the most deserving. Weigh what I have said, and may the Lord God give you a right judgment in all things. It is not from motives of impertinence that I have presumed to mention these particulars, but from the sincere affection I have for you and your's. Adieu, my dear friend, and forgive me if my regard has carried me too far. My best respects, when you write next to Bath, and my kind compliments to the young gentlemen. Do not neglect to take the air every day. Once more, adieu.

LETTER II.

TO MR. MORRIS.

Broad-Hembury, near Honiton, Devon, Sept. 2, 1768.

It is now above eight years since I saw or heard from my ever dear Mr. Morris. The Lord knows you are near my heart, and are often present to my thoughts. God grant that this letter may find my valued friend as well in body, and as lively in soul, as when I saw him last.

I have been in orders between six and seven years; and now write to you from my living. The Spirit of God has kept me steadfast in his glorious truths, and gives me much joy and peace in believing. I trust, too, that my labours, as a minister, have been owned from above, to the calling in of some chosen vessels, and to the consolation of others who were, before, quickened from their death in trespasses and sins; which I mention to the praise of the glory of his grace, who vouchsafes to make use of the meanest, the feeblest, and the unworthiest instruments to accomplish his designs of love towards those he delights to save.—Whilst I am writing, the fire kindles in my soul: may it reach your heart when this letter reaches your hands. I am at present high on the mount of divine love, and can sing with the Church, Isa. lxi. 10. "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord," &c.—How is it with you? Are you as zealous for Christ, and for souls, as when God made you the means of my conversion twelve years ago? O that the Lord would rend the heavens, and come down and set you all in a flame for himself! Permit your spiritual son to remind you of the sweet, the memorable days and months that are past. Indeed, and indeed, I love you tenderly, in the bowels of Jesus Christ. How has my heart burnt within me, and how have my tears flowed, like water from the smitten rock, when I have heard you preach the unsearchable riches of his grace, blood, and righteousness! The word came with power, and with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. And is it true, can it be possible, that you should cease from your work of calling sinners to repentance? Do you withdraw your hand from the gospel plough, after God has made it prosper so long in your hands? I am told so; but I cannot believe it. O man of God, stir up the gift that is in thee: let it not rust and moulder by lying useless. The Lord hath often spoke to me by your mouth: Oh, that he would now speak to you by my pen! Do, at my request, meet the dear people of C., and who knows but there may once more be showers of blessing? Blow the trumpet in Zion, as heretofore. While life and health and strength continue, let your feet stand upon the mountains, and the law of gospel-kindness dwell upon your tongue, to the very last: yea, let your lips feed many.—Adieu. I scarce know how to leave off when I write to any of my brethren in the faith. If even the poor, feeble, mortal saints below, love one another so well; no wonder that the love of an infinite God to his own dear elect should be from everlasting to everlasting.—Electing, justifying, regenerating, sanctifying, and persevering grace, have been, and are, the subjects of my ministry: and, I hope, will be, to my latest breath. If a messenger of Christ is under the lively, experimental influence of these glorious truths; the word of his master will be as fire in his bones: yea, he will be in pangs, as it were, like a woman in travail, until Christ is formed in the hearts of them that hear. God Almighty pour out such a spirit of fervency on my dear Mr. Morris, and on his ever affectionate friend,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER III.

TO MR. PHILIPS.

Broad Hembury, Sept. 6, 1768-

SIR,

I BELIEVE I shall go to town by way of Salisbury; in which case I will certainly do myself the pleasure of calling on you. I wish I could fulfil your request in the other particular, concerning which you write; but the times will not allow it. Every one that knows me, knows that I have the greatest and most cordial regard for the evangelical dissenters. I am exactly the same, in that respect, as when you knew me first: and most heartily wish that the wall of partition was so far pulled down, as to admit all gospel ministers to occupy each others' pulpits, without distinction of party and denomination. But, as this is a happiness we cannot expect to see, I am under a necessity of foregoing the satisfaction it would give me to hold forth the word of life to those Christians who are beyond the pale of the establishment: except (which in the course of my ministry many hundreds have done) any of them are so condescending as to attend on me who, they know, am tied up from waiting on them.—I am well acquainted with Mr. Elliot; and an excellent man he is: but he has set himself more at liberty than I can be, by absolutely renouncing all connection with the church of England; which, I freely own, conscience will not suffer me to do: and I am clear, moreover, that it would be going out of bounds, and over-leaping those limits which Providence hath prescribed me, was I to attempt it.

Pray make my affectionate compliments acceptable to your people, and let them know that it is neither bigotry, want of respect, nor want of love, that hinders me from complying with the request they have done me the favour to make. Lawful in itself, I am convinced it would be: but, all things considered, far from expedient. As matters at present stand, it is a great blessing, never to be sufficiently valued and acknowledged, that there are some faithful ministers of every Protestant denomination among us: so that no denomination, unless particularly circumstanced, need go beyond their own tents, in order to gather the gospel manna: by which wise and gracious dispensation of things, God's elect of every name are fed and nourished up to life eternal, notwithstanding the nominal distinctions which bigotry, prejudice, and human laws, have fixed. I am concerned to hear of Mr. H——'s defection. If he was ever of us in reality, God will, in due time, bring him to us again. A truly gracious man, like a thorough good watch, may deviate, and point wrong, for a season; but, like the machine just mentioned, will after a time come round, and point right as before. In the mean while, let such instances teach us to be jealous over our own corrupt hearts; make us dependent, sensibly and increasingly dependent on the power and faithfulness of the Holy Ghost: stir us up to prayer, that we may be kept from being carried away with the error of the wicked; and put a song of thanksgiving into our mouths, to that God whose free, invincible grace hath enabled us to stand, when others (in appearance stronger than we) have fallen, and become as water that runneth apace. You enquire about my usefulness, acceptance, and number of hearers. My parish is very large, and considerably populous. My church, I suppose, will hold six hundred at least. Strangers, I apprehend, usually make one-third of my auditory; and the word has been signally blest to some, both in the parish and out of it. I have the greatest reason to believe that, within the course of the last twelvemonth, God has owned my ministry more than ever. May my master's feet go on to sound behind me; and may the last works be continually more and greater than the preceding!

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER IV.

TO MR. RUTTER.

Broad Hembury, Oct. 3, 1768.

REV. AND WORTHY SIR,

SLENDER as our acquaintance is, I yet cannot forbear requesting leave to express the real concern I feel, on being informed of the afflictive visitation you lately experienced: if that may be termed afflictive, which is the result of God's unerring providence, who does all things well. May he vouchsafe to sanctify this, and every subsequent dispensation which may yet befall you! May the light of his gracious countenance, the comforts of his Spirit, and the cheering intimations of his favour, be your strength, and your portion, when heart and flesh fail! You have, I trust, a merciful and faithful High-Priest above, who bears you on his heart, and is touched with the feeling of your infirmities. To him let us look; on him let the anchor of our reliance be cast. The merit of his blood and righteousness, like the waving of Elijah's mantle, shall smite the waters of death; so that the stream shall part hither and thither, and open a way for his redeemed to pass over on dry ground. Doubt not, dear sir, but he will send forth his light and his truth to lead you to his holy hill, and to his dwelling-place, that land of rest, and that city of habitation, where the inhabitants shall no more say I am sick. I beg an interest in your prayers, and remain, with much respect and esteem, Rev. Sir, your affectionate brother, and most humble servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER V.

TO MR. BOTTOMLEY.

New-Way, Westminster, Dec. 3, 1768.

WORTHY SIR,

I HAVE read attentively the paper you condescended to put into my hands, and which I return, because I apprehend you meant I should only peruse it. I not only approve, but admire, the modesty with which you write. I pray God I may be enabled, more and more, to adopt the same truly Christian spirit. And I verily hope and believe that that most gracious Being who has led you thus far, will go on to translate you farther and farther into the light and liberty of his children.—As I once took occasion to tell you, it is much the same with mistakes in matters of judgment, as it was with the two disciples in the dungeon of Philippi: first the prison shakes; and next the doors fly open. I am heartily glad that you are shaken as to the system you have long embraced; and trust that it is prelude to your deliverance from it. I do not trouble you with my thoughts on the substance of your paper: though I must own there is not, in the whole of it, any single exception against the doctrine of predestination, which will not admit of a very easy solution. But I omit attempting this, as the person to whom that letter was particularly addressed is abundantly more capable than myself of obviating your doubts. Suffer me, dear sir, to repeat, with all humility, the request I made to you some time ago. Be not hasty in determining your judgment on this most important point. View the question on all sides. Chiefly keep your eye fixed on the Scriptures; and derive by humble, earnest, waiting prayer, all your light and knowledge thence. One thing I am very clear in, that if you reduce your ideas to the standard of Scripture, and make this the model of those; suffering the unerring word of revelation to have the casting vote, and turning your mind into the gospel mould; you must and will eventually throw the idol of Arminianism, in all its branches, to the moles and to the bats; you will no longer dwell with Mesech, nor have your habitation among the tents of Kedar. Having tasted the good old wine of distinguishing grace, you will no longer have any relish for the new scheme of grace without a plan, and of a random salvation; for you will both know and acknowledge that the old is better. Hoping to see that happy time, I remain, with great esteem, dear sir,

Your affectionate brother in Christ,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER VI.

MR. N——

Broad Hembury, Oct. 5, 1772.

DEAR SIR,

You need not trouble yourself to send me the pamphlet you mention, entitled, A Philosophical Survey of Nature. It is already in my possession. I remember to have read it several years ago, when it first came to my hands: and since my receipt of your last favour, I have given it a fresh perusal. The author is, undoubtedly, a professed materialist. His system therefore is atheistical, to all intents and purposes. He is, I should imagine, a person of too much sense to be an absolute atheist himself: but he seems to wish he could. The two grand principles which enter into the very basis of his scheme, viz., That matter may have existed from all eternity; and that matter may, by organization, be refined into intelligence; are positions which, if admitted, would lay the axe to the very root of all existence purely spiritual; and, consequently, render the being of God impossible.

To such horrid lengths of absurdity and impiety are men, even those of the brightest talents, liable, when they unhappily shut their eyes against that written revelation which so kindly holds the lamp to benighted reason. One would almost think that writers of this cast are purposely raised up by Providence to shew mankind the necessity of superior illumination, and to demonstrate the utter insufficiency of mere reason, genius, and philosophy; to guide us either to happiness or truth.

This is the only principle on which I can account for the glaring inconsistencies which never fail to disgrace the reasonings of infidels. The very author now under consideration, though he attenuates his theory to a very nice and plausible texture, is yet guilty of departing from an axiom which he professes heartily to adopt, and from which more than a few of his own deductions are spun. The axiom is, that every effect must result from some prior, producing cause. If so (and surely, if this be not true, we have no evidence of anything), how is it possible for matter to be eternal? Matter must be either the first cause, or an effect. Should the ingenious writer affirm matter to be the first cause: he would only beg the question, by taking for granted what (I am bold to say) he will never be able to prove: and on a point of this consequence, wherein both religion and philosophy are so essentially concerned, the bare opinion and unsupported assertion even of this able speculator will never carry the force of demonstration. On the other hand, if matter, in all its diversity of modes, cannot be proved to be the first cause [i. e. to have caused its own existence] unprejudiced reason will immediately conclude that matter must, originally, have been the effect of a superior intelligent power, which intelligent power could be no other than that adorable agent whom we call God.

If the whole system of material nature be (as this author himself acknowledges) a regular succession of causes and effects; will it not follow that the eternity of matter is a matter of absolute impossibility? Let us instance in a horse. Who was Lightfoot's father? Turk.—Who was father to Turk? Sweepstakes.—Who got Sweepstakes? Hazel. Were we capable of tracing back the pedigree of Lightfoot to its original source, we should not stop until we came to the very first horse that ever existed. Being arrived so high as that, another question would yet remain: how came this first horse to exist at all? Certainly by the will and power of some superior being.

Would not reason laugh at the man who should affirm that there never was a first horse, but that horses existed eternally?

There must, therefore, in all our ascending enquiries, be some ultimatum, some given point at which to stop. This given point, this first cause, is God.—The same analysis which has been applied to Lightfoot, will hold equally true, when applied to any material thing whatever. All must terminate somewhere: for there is “no effect without a cause.” Consequently matter is not eternal.

“But may not matter be so organized and refined as to rise into what we call intelligence?” The plain English of this question is, “May not matter (such as a cabbage, a marble statue, a candle, or a chest) be able to hear, see, feel, taste, smell, reason, speak, read, write, and walk?” If any individual of the human species can coolly and in earnest suppose this; let his next of kin (if the insane man's possessions will recompense the trouble) sue for a statute of lunacy, and transmit him to his proper apartment in Moorfields.

I confess myself ashamed to encounter such a position with any degree of seriousness. Suffer me, however, to ask: Is there no essential, but only a modal difference, between the writer of the Philosophical Sur- vey of Nature, and the pen with which he committed his ideas to writing.

A correspondent less polite than yourself would tell me, perhaps, that instead of enquiring into the capacities of our author's pen, it is time I should lay down my own.

I cannot, however, do this without first repeating the affection and respect with which I am yours, &c.,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER VII

To B. S., Esq.

Broad Hembury, Nov. 9, 1772.

SIR,

ACQUAINTED as you are with the leading objects of my thoughts, you still would not easily conjecture on what speculation they lately turned.—I have been comparing my own situation (not, as some philosophers advise, with persons of inferior rank to myself, but) with that of those whom the world calls great. Every great man I know has passed before me in a kind of intellectual review: and the result is that, if it were even in my power, I would not make an exchange of condition with any one of the twenty-seven.

To be happy we must be virtuous; and in order to our becoming truly virtuous, we must experience the grace of God, which bringeth salvation.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER VIII.

To AMBROSE SERLE, Esq.

Broad Hembury, Nov. 20, 1772.

SIR,

CONTRARY to my wishes, and by a sort of fatality for which I find myself unable to account, I am usually least regular in writing to those whom I most regard. Though incapable of forgetting them, experience proves that I am but too capable of seeming to neglect them: and none has more reason to be displeas'd with me on this account than my dear, my very dear friend, to whom I am now, after a long interval of silence, addressing myself at last.

How many defects have I for your candour to excuse! Prove yourself candid indeed, by excusing them all. Thus you will lay me under still deeper obligation, and shame me, by your condescension, into a more punctual acknowledgment of your favours.—Your favours, dear sir, eminently deserve the name. They have followed me at home and abroad, ever since I saw you, and if I had, by a deadness to all gratitude, been even disposed to forget you, they would have constantly reminded me of you, whether I would or not.

In justice however to myself as well as to you, I must repeat my long intermitted assurances, that the person does not breathe whom I love and respect more than yourself. If I do not tell you so as often as I ought, impute the omission to any cause except the want of those two.

The goodness of God still continues to surround me on every side. Oh that my thankfulness and improvements in grace bore some little proportion to his exuberance of mercies! But in vain do I look within myself for that excellence which I shall never find there, until death is swallowed up in victory. God enable me, in the mean while, to see my own nothingness more and more; and to trust in that great Fulfiller of all righteousness, who “Toiled for our ease, and for our safety bled.

To those who believe he is [τιμη] preciousness in the abstract. And the more we see of his preciousness, the more humbling views we have of our own vileness. Indeed self-renunciation is the grand central point of the spiritual life. It is the ratio formalis, the very essence of true religion. Oh, for a larger measure of it! We are then happiest and safest, when we lie lowest, and feel that Christ and grace are all in all.

But I am, unawares, almost preaching to one at whose feet I wish to sit. May you take the best revenge, and preach largely to me in return! The longer your sermon, the better I shall like it: like him who thought the longest of Demosthenes' orations the best. I greatly desire to hear from you: and hope you are too forgiving to follow the bad example of delay which I have set you.

Commend myself to the continuance of your affection I need not. Commend myself to your prayers I ought, and humbly do. Every blessing be with you. Above all, the best of blessings, the peace and love of God in Christ.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER IX.

To Mrs. G.—

Broad Hembury, Nov. 20, 1772.

WILL good Mrs. G. permit the most unworthy, but not the least sincere, of her well-wishers, to enquire after her health; and at a considerable distance of place, and after a long interval of time, to repeat his thanks for her many instances of politeness and condescension?

Above all, Madam, how is it with your soul? What are your views of God and Christ and heaven? Lively, I trust, and full of glory. Yet if our views are dim and languid, still He abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself. Not upon our frames, but upon the adorable Giver of them, is all our safety built. If we cannot follow him in the light, God help us to follow him in the dark: and if we cannot follow him so, to fall down at his feet, and sink into nothing, under the feelings of our own vileness. They who are enabled thus to fall, shall be raised in due time. I know not why, but I could not forbear writing to you. May the Spirit of the living God write his consolations on your heart, and cause your triumphs in Christ to abound more and more. Impute this liberty to respect and esteem; and believe me to be with a great share of both, Madam, your obliged and obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER X.

To MR. SAMUEL NAYLOR.

Broad Hembury, Nov. 27, 1772.

[Extract]

I AM informed that that inveterate troubler in Israel, Mr. J. W——, has lately published a fourth squib against Mr. Hill; I should be glad to see it. What a mercy it is that the enemies of the gospel, amidst all their plenitude of malice, have little skill and less power! Mr. W——, considered as a reasoner, is one of the most contemptible writers that ever set pen to paper. O that he, in whose hand the hearts of all men are, may make even this opposer of grace a monument of his almighty power to save! God is witness how earnestly I wish it may consist with the divine will to touch the heart and open the eyes of that unhappy man. I hold it as much my duty to pray for his conversion as to expose the futility of his railings against the truths of the gospel.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XI.

To MR. B. E——.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 4, 1772.

[Extract]

I AGREE with you that the expression [viz., That one drop of Christ's blood would have sufficed to the redemption of sinners] has been used by some very pious and well-meaning persons. Yet I can by no means look upon the idea itself as true, or on the expression as warrantable. If an individual drop had been sufficient, we might indeed well ask, Why all this waste of sufferings and of love? The overplus was, according to this supposition absolutely shed in vain. But I cannot bring myself to believe that any part of Christ's most precious humiliation was superfluous and unnecessary. His ineffable dignity as God, and his absolute innocence as man, forbid me to imagine that the Father would inflict a single grain of punishment on his co-equal and immaculate Son, beyond what was absolutely requisite to the plenary payment of our infinite debt. If it be a rule even in the operations of nature, frustra fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora; much more strongly will it hold in the present argument. What idea should we have of that man's wisdom who should lavish a million of guineas to procure what a shilling might purchase!

As to the second question, "Whether sinners might not have been saved in some other way, than by the incarnation, righteousness, and death of Christ?" I make no scruple to give it as my judgment that there was no other possible way of salvation for the lost sons of Adam. If there had, Infinite Wisdom and Goodness would certainly have fixed upon it, in preference to the sorrows and agonies, the wounds and death of him who had done no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. His own prayer, If it be possible, let this cup (the cup of pain and death) pass from me, would most infallibly have been granted (for the Father heareth him always), and Christ could no more pray than he could bleed in vain, if any thing short of the oblation of himself could have obtained eternal redemption for the people of his love.—Ought not Christ to have suffered these things? Ουχι ταυτα εδει παθειν; was there not a must be, a necessity for it? Yes, there was. And, upon any other hypothesis, I see not how it could please the Father to bruise the sinless Messiah and put him to grief, without forfeiting every claim to justice, wisdom, and goodness.

Neither is this "fettering and limiting the omnipotence of God." It is a received maxim in metaphysics, and no inaxim can be more just and reasonable, than an essential contradiction is no object of power. Now the pardon of sin, without an adequate expiation; the justification of sinners without a perfect righteousness; and, in a word, the salvation of the guilty without a complete redemption; would have essentially contradicted every attribute of God, and every declaration of his will. It is therefore putting no more limitation on the divine power to believe that fallen men could not possibly be restored but by the intervention of Christ's obedience, atonement, and intercession; than to believe that God cannot possibly cease to be wise and holy, just and true. Infinite exemption from all possible imperfection is a proof, not of defective power, but of such inconceivable greatness, as more than dazzles the keenest view of man, and utterly absorbs the most extended comprehension of all created intellect.

I feel the overwhelming glory of the subject too forcibly to proceed.—May the adorable, the ever-blessed God, who only hath independent immortality, dwelling in the light which no man, in the present state of unspiritualized nature can approach unto; may he, my dear sir, shine into our hearts, and inspire us with "wonder, love, and praise! Soon will mortality be swallowed up of life: and then with what holy contempt shall we look back, and look down on the littleness, the comparative nothingness, of our puny reasonings when below! An angel of light is not more superior in knowledge, dignity, and bliss, to an infant in the cradle, than the souls of the elect, when death transmits them to the throne of God, differ from what they are while plunged, I had almost said, while buried, in the living sepulchre of a mortal body.

"Minors of yesterday we are;
Nor into manhood rise,
Till death pronounces us of age,
And crowns us for the skies."

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XII.

TO RICHARD HILL, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 11, 1772.

[Extract]

THE farther my thread of life is extended, the more clearly I see, and the more deeply I feel, the infinite importance of those inestimable doctrines of which God has made you so able an assertor. Go on, sir, in the strength of Him who hath placed you foremost in this blessed warfare; and doubt not that he will enable you to be more than conqueror through his love. Certainly this is not a time for any who have his cause at heart, to hold their peace. Fond as I suppose most men naturally are, of ease and quiet; there is still a blessing incomparably superior: even the honest and indefatigable avowal of those truths which lie at the foundation of all that can render us happy in time and eternity; truths, in which the glory of God, the consolation of his saints, and the interests of holiness, are so eminently and essentially involved. I pray God that you may never, as Dr. Young expresses it, "unbuckle your armour, until you put on your shroud."

I have never seen Mr. W——'s Remarks on the Farrago, nor Mr. F's Logica Genevensis. But, if I may conjecture of those by what I have already seen in time past, you have abundantly more than even the goodness of your cause in your favour. May your smooth stones of the brook, slung by the hand of faith, continue to pierce those foreheads of brass, which oppose themselves to the living God.

I admire and bless his providence, which has put you on entering the lists, not only against the declared adversaries of the gospel but also against its pretended friends: who, under the mask of spirituality, affect to promote the religion of Jesus: while, in very deed, they are labouring to cut it up by the roots. Two or three years ago you seemed to think that I was rather excessive in forming such a judgment of them. Themselves have since given you ample reason to be of my mind.

May the Holy Spirit keep you lively, and humble, and richly comfortable in your own soul, while you wield the spiritual sword, which, as matters now stand, you cannot sheathe without sin. And let me presume to drop a hint which, by the way, I ought to have impressed upon myself; namely, consult not your own ease at the expense of God's cause. Be not weary of, and God will keep you from being weary in, well doing. Forgive my freedom, and know, that if I had not the highest opinion of your candour, I should not express my wish with so little ceremony. Dr. Dodderidge was strengthened and comforted at a time when he was greatly straitened in soul, by only hearing (as he was riding through a country village) a child reading at a door to his schoolmistress, those words, Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, and as is thy day so shall thy strength be. May this hasty scribble, though coming from me, who am in all things a child, except in years, be condescendingly accepted: and may my utmost prayers and expectations concerning you be answered.

—Believe me to be, Ever your's,

in him who died for us and rose again,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

LETTER XIII.

TO MRS. BACON.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 11, 1772.

I HOPE I stand too fair in dear Mrs. B.'s opinion to be suspected of levity in friendship, only because I do not trouble her with my respects quite so often as I ought. However appearances may be against me, realities are not. I shall always remember you, madam, with high esteem: and consider myself more than a little interested in whatever refers to your spiritual or secular happiness.

For this reason, on my receipt of your last favour, I deeply felt for the writer. That spirit of grief and that turn of dejection by which it was so strongly marked, made me, whether I would or no, sigh on your behalf at the throne of God.

Oh, let faith dry your tears: and know that what he wills and does, is, and must be, not only right but best. Afflict not yourself with uneasy apprehensions concerning the state of him whom you mourn as a husband, and I regret as a friend. Leave his soul with him who, I humbly trust, redeemed it with his own most precious blood blood which cleanses from all sin; and sprinkled with which, any and every sinner who is enabled to trust in it, may lift up his head with boldness and joy, in the presence of him who chargeth even the angels with folly. Blessed be God, that dear Mr. Bacon pleaded that availing blood, as the basis of his supplications for mercy. — I have read, concerning good Mr. Fox, the martyrologist, that “he could never refuse giving pecuniary relief to any who asked him in the name and for the sake of Christ.” Much less will the Great Father of mercies reject the petitions of those whom his blessed Spirit hath stirred up (and none can stir us up but his own Spirit) to intreat his favour, on account of what the agonizing friend of sinners has done and suffered for the unworthy, the guilty, the hell-deserving. It is a plea that cannot fail, while God is God. May the plea be your’s and mine, both in life and death.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XIV.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ

Broad Hembury, Dec. 18, 1772.

DEAR Mr. Serle’s most obliging favour of the 28th ult. calls for an affectionate acknowledgment on my part. I must, however, enter an exception to the ceremonious passages which occur in his much esteemed letter; and beg leave to file a protest against all future declarations of that high respect with which my valued friend vouchsafes to honour me. I know, my dear sir, that your politeness is not a mere complaisance, like that of the world. If I considered it in such a view, I could dispense with it readily enough. But your transparent sincerity, which adds weight and seriousness to the elegance with which you write, is the very circumstance that humbles and abashes me. Certain I am, that you condescend to allow me a place in your regard; and, by that regard, I intreat you to consider me, and to address me, as (what indeed I am) less than the least of all saints. The highest character to which I aspire (God grant I may be entitled to it) is that of an elect sinner, redeemed with blood, and saved by grace.

I rejoice unfeignedly on your behalf that you are favoured with a calm and settled comfort from on high. I said from on high: for that peace and joy which lay us in the fast, at the footstool of free-grace, do and must come from God alone. To be absorbed and melted as into nothing, under the overwhelming radiance of his unmerited love; to sit in holy silence and stillness of soul, beneath the shadow of the cross; to derive, by the ministration of his Spirit, all our hope, happiness, and tranquillity, from the inestimable merits and intercession of the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne; to cast anchor on the covenant favour and covenant faithfulness of Father, Son and Spirit; — are the grand and only sources of holiness and joy.

I admire your excellent motto. It is more than a motto; it is a maxim, an axiom, certain as certainty itself. Deo duce omnia bona, is the language of reason no less than of faith. It is a text on which eternity itself will be an everlasting comment. God enable us to live under the cheerful influence of that great principle, until mortality is swallowed up of life.

I did not apprehend that your knowledge of — amounted to an intimacy. I thank you for informing me of it, as it gives me a double pleasure. You may easily guess that I mean the pleasure of congratulating you on such a connection; and the pleasure of knowing that so worthy a personage has the happiness of so valuable a friend. Had I the honour of being acquainted with his —, I should felicitate him on his acquisition: an acquisition which rarely falls to the portion of the great. God, I doubt not, will enable you to wait with implicit confidence, and with the most passive serenity, the issue of his own all-wise purposes. He that believeth shall not (at least he should not) make haste.

You condescend to enquire after my projected Life of Archbishop Laud. I cannot say that I have not began it. But I am in doubt whether I ought to proceed in it. Ecclesiastical matters wear a very different aspect among us from what they did when I first formed the design. We bid fair, at present, not for having a high church, but for having no church at all. A review of the life and times of that prelate, pregnant with the most horrid detail of civil and religious tyranny, would hardly be seasonable at present, when every unfledged ignoramus has a stone to fling at the establishment. I may perhaps seem to speculate too minutely, but I assure you it is a speculation which has considerable weight with me.

It is time, however, that my speculations should cease to intrude on the attention and valuable moments of my dear friend; else he may be induced to suppose that my motto is,

Scriptus et in Tergo, necdum finitus, Orestes.

I shall therefore, with affectionate compliments to Mrs. S. and your family in general, subscribe myself, dear sir,

Your obliged and obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XV.

TO REV. DR. B. of Salisbury.

Broad Hembury, Feb. 4, 1773.

YOUR late favour, dear sir, arrived in due course; and as your letters never fail to be fraught with friendship, politeness, and good sense, I cannot but lament that so few of them find their way hither. If you had my excuse to plead, I could not with any tolerable propriety expect you to write oftener to me, than I to you. But as you have hitherto found no employment for the printers, you are the more at leisure to entertain and improve me by manuscript.

Accept my condolences on the loss of your uncle at Bullbridge: the qualities of whose heart rendered him more truly amiable and respectable than, without them, the brightest talents could possibly have done.

Your account of your own health is such as I ever wish to receive. Next to the pleasure of enjoying your conversation, I value every information that assures me of your welfare. As to myself, in consequence of being well, I have for some months past been far from idle: though, that industry might not make me ill, I keep (as you rightly conjecture) to my old custom of intermixing labour with occasional relaxation. I could wish, indeed, to be ever on the wing, ever on the stretch: but it is impossible in the present state. We must wait for every species of perfection until we enter a superior world.

What think you concerning the archiepiscopal scheme of "reforming" the liturgy and articles? Such a plan is certainly on the carpet; and it is certainly originated at Lambeth. The ostensible pretext is, to expunge some exceptionable passages which are "offensive to thinking men and hurtful to tender consciences." The new Lambeth Articles (if Providence do not render the design abortive) will be of a very different cast from the old ones of 1595.

I am much obliged to you for your kind invitation, in my way to London, if I should have occasion to go thither. The truth is, I ought to have seen the capital long ago. But I really dread to do so. The sight of places, and the conversation of persons, where and with whom I have enjoyed so many happy hours in the company of my late honoured parent, will naturally recal her so strongly to my remembrance, that I fear my nerves will hardly bear it. I am thankful that she never accepted any of my invitations into Devonshire; as it would now have only tended to revive those ideas which I should be happier never to recollect. The higher a departed satisfaction has been, the more painful (supposing the departure to be final) is its remembrance. Philosophy may censure these feelings as a weakness; but they are such a weakness as I cannot help. Resignation is one thing, insensibility is another.

I have unawares extended these reflections to too great a length. If I was not writing to a friend, I should certainly, on a review, cancel this letter, and substitute a more revised half-sheet. But, as the case stands, I will avail myself of your candour. Believe me to be,

Rev. and dear sir, ever your's,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

LETTER XVI.

To MRS. S. H.

Broad Hembury, Feb. 5, 1713.

MADAM,

My parishioner, Mrs. H. H., desires me to present you with her most respectful and affectionate thanks for your late kind and obliging letter. Indeed, as the good woman told me, with tears of gratitude, your many instances of friendship and regard are such as plainly indicate the particular hand of Providence which alone could raise up so valuable and disinterested a supporter of her old age. She is inexpressibly sensible of the kindness of your offer, respecting your readiness to send her some additional assistance on account of her present illness. But she desires most thankfully to decline putting you to that trouble: as, through the goodness of God, she can hitherto defray the expenses of her sickness by means of your stated supply. I hope she recovers, though slowly, her pain and feebleness continuing very great.

She requests me to inform you, that any advantages of outward situation which might attend her removal to Columpton, would not, in her judgment, compensate for the spiritual want of such a ministry as she could sit under with comfort.

Permit me now, madam, to apologize for my taking upon myself to acquaint you with these particulars. The truth is, Mrs. H. has now no near neighbour in whom she can venture to confide, but myself. She knows I love her dearly, to which I am induced by the grace which is given her of God. I may safely express myself so unreservedly of one who cannot be less than ninety. And I own there are very few in my parish, large as it is, whom I so tenderly esteem. Her many doubts and fears respecting the safety of her soul, and the certainty of her acceptance with God, are, to me, so many proofs that she is indeed chosen, redeemed, and justified. And I am persuaded that the Lord will not take her hence, until he has shone her doubts and fears away. At least, it is a remark, to which I never remember to have met with a single exception, that such of God's people as are most exercised with fear and trembling on their journey through life, are the most comfortable and triumphant in the hour of death. Like Mr. Ready-to-halt, in the Pilgrim's Progress, they are usually the first to fling away their crutches, when they actually come in view of Jordan.

It would be needless to inform you that Mrs. H. begs you to accept her best respects and most grateful acknowledgments. To which I add the sincere compliments of, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

P. S. If Providence should prolong all our lives until summer, and you should have leisure and inclination to see Mrs. H. before she goes to heaven, I have a part of the vicarage house at your service.

LETTER XVII.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, March 5, 1773.

EVER DEAR SIR,

GOD, I trust and believe, will himself be the giver of that support and consolation, which I, with all my sympathy, can only wish and pray that you may experience. Having premised my hope, permit me to thank you for your letter: the only one of your's that ever gave me pain.

With melting heart, and lifted eye, I bless the Lord for his having pointed the late providential shaft with gold: in other words for his having softened your unspeakable loss of dear Mrs. Serle (dearer as an angel than when only a saint) with such undoubted and just assurance of her eternal rest in Christ. May those foretastes of the joy that shall be revealed, with which she was so eminently favoured, be our strength and song, during the appointed course of our remaining pilgrimage, until the Spirit of God have matured us for the inheritance of the saints in light.

I have long observed that such of his people as are least on the mount, while travelling to heaven, are highest on it, and replenished with the richest discoveries of divine love, in the closing scene of life. When they come in actual view of that river which parts the church below from the church above, the celestial city rises full in sight. The sense of interest in the covenant of grace becomes clearer and brighter. The book of life is opened to the eye of assurance. The Holy Spirit more feelingly applies the blood of sprinkling, and warms the soul with that robe of righteousness which Jesus wrought. The once feeble believer is made as David. The once trembling hand is enabled to lay fast hold on the cross of Christ. The sun goes down without a cloud.

Those lines of Dr. Watts are as weighty as they are beautiful:

"Just such is the Christian. His race he begins,
Like the sun in a mist, while he mourns for his sins,
And melts into tears. Then he breaks out and shines,
And travels his heavenly way.
But, as he draws nearer to finish his race,
Like a fine setting sun, he looks richer in grace;
And gives a sure hope at the end of his days,
Of rising in brighter array."

On occasions of this kind, I never offer to condole. I would wish to conceal even my own feelings. Officious lenitives generally operate as corrosives, when tendered to a heart that bleeds under so exquisite a loss; and do but irritate the wound they are meant to assuage. Rather let me wish you to take down your harp from the willows, and to adore the unerring wisdom of him who is daily "accomplishing the number of his elect, and hastening his kingdom."

You have my thanks, dear sir, for your polite and obliging invitation. Should business force me to London this year, I certainly shall, were it only for my own sake, pay my respects to you, as usual; though I shall hardly prevail with myself to take full advantage of your kind and friendly offer.

Our meeting together again on earth is, humanly speaking, precarious. Not so our meeting in heaven. We are by no means sure of the former; but I am fully assured of the latter.

Grace, mercy, and peace, be with you and your's. So prays, from the inmost of his heart, dear sir,

Your obliged, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XVIII.

TO RICHARD HILL, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, March 12, 1773.

[Extract]

I AM told that Mr. Fletcher has it in contemplation to make an attack on me too. He is welcome. I am ready for him. Not shall I, in that case, altogether imitate the amiable examples of yourself and your brother; unless Mr. Fletcher should treat me with more decency than he has hitherto observed towards others. Tenderness, it is very evident, has no good effect on Mr. Wesley, and his pretended family of love. Witness the rancour with which Mr. Hervey's memory and works are treated by that lovely family. For my own part, I shall never attempt to hew such millstones with a feather. They must be served as nettles: press them close, and they cannot sting. Yet have they my prayers, and my best wishes, for their present and future salvation. But not one hair's breadth of the gospel will I ever (God being my helper) offer up at their shrine, or sacrifice to their idol.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XIX.

TO MR. RYLAND, JUN.

London, April 30, 1773.

MANY and best thanks to dear Mr. R. for his two valuable and much esteemed letters; as also for the several pamphlets with which the latter of his two favours was accompanied. Mr. Richard Hill had shewn me Wesley's second remarks immediately on my coming to town: I am, however, greatly obliged to you for forwarding it.

Heartily I wish that I could avail myself of your dear father's invitation to Northampton. But it is a pleasure which my time, at present, will not suffer me to enjoy. I must, volente Deo, leave town next week. Should life be spared, and opportunity granted, in future, I know not the family with whom I could spend a week or two more profitably and agreeably than your's.

The word of God runs and is glorified in London. Cobler Tom laments, it seems, publicly from his preaching-tub (mis-named a pulpit) that such an Antinomian as myself should have crowded auditories, while the preachers of the pure gospel (by which you know he means free-will, merit, and perfection) are so thinly attended.

The envy, malice, and fury of Wesley's party are inconceivable. But, violently as they hate me, I dare not, I cannot, hate them in return. I have not so learned Christ.—They have my prayers and my best wishes for their present and eternal salvation. But their errors have my opposition also: and this is the irremissible sin which those red-hot bigots know not how to forgive.

You desire to be informed of the title to my intended publication now in the press. It runs thus: "Historic Proof of the doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England: including a brief Account of some eminent Persons, famous for their Adoption of that System, both before and since the Reformation; with Specimens of their Testimonies."

I fear it will extend to a four or five shilling volume. But the facts and evidences are so numerous, and drawn from such a multiplicity of sources, that I could not possibly bring it into less compass. Acquaint your good father, that his grand favourite and mine, archbishop Bradwardin, makes a very eminent figure in the chapter which relates to our English heroes.

Though I have for fifteen years past (i. e. for very near half my life), been solidly and clearly convinced of the original and intrinsic Calvinism of the established Church; still I did not know that the subject was supported by such a vast confluence of positive authorities until the furious opposition of the Methodists forced me to take a nearer and more exact view of the argument. Thus far, at least, I am obliged to that virulent sect. And, on a retrospective survey of the whole matter, I myself stand astonished at that profusion of evidence which pours from every quarter in favour of the main point. My own collections (to go no farther), viewed in the aggregate, absolutely surprise me. And yet the argument is far from being exhausted.—But if that is not exhausted, my paper almost is. I must therefore conclude: having but just room to salute you and your family, to commend me to your prayers, and to subscribe myself, ever dear sir,

Your's most affectionately

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XX.

TO THE REV. MR. P.

[Extract] London, May 3, 1773.

YOU were not mis-informed as to my having had an interview with Thomas Oliver. It happened thus:

On Saturday, the 8th of last month, I was going to see good Mr. Hitchin of Hoxton. On my way, passing by the Foundery, it occurred to me that I had now an opportunity of gratifying my curiosity by purchasing Wesley's last printed Journal. I therefore went in and found a man reading, in what is called the Book-room, i. e. the room where Wesley's publications are sold. The man, on my telling him what I wanted, answered, "Sir, I am not the person that sells the books, but I will step and call him." He left me for two or three minutes, and returned with (I think) two other men and three women. Having paid for the Journal and taken my change, I was coming away, when one of the men, who proved to be Mr. Joseph Cownley, asked me, "whether my name was not Top-lady?" My answer was, "Yes, sir, at your service." All present immediately assumed an air of much civility. I stopped and chatted with them for, I believe, ten minutes. In the course of my stay I took out my snuff-box. Mr. Cownley asked for a pinch. As I held it to him, I said, with a smile, "Is it not against the law of this place for a believer to take snuff?" Mr. Cownley huddled the matter up, by alleging, that he was troubled with the head-ach. Immediately on which one of the good women (whom I afterwards found to be the wife of Mr. Thomas Oliver) said, directing herself to me, "O sir, Mr. Wesley has no objection to people's taking snuff medicinally." I answered, "I am glad you are allowed some latitude: I thought you were tied up by an absolute prohibition, without any loop-hole of exception." Our chat (which, though humorous, was extremely civil on all sides) being over, I took leave of the company.—I should have told you before that, no sooner was my name authenticated than one of the women slipped out of the room. Who she was, I know not: but she was sufficiently corpulent: as broad, comparatively, as she was long. The reason of her decampment, I suppose, was so announce the tidings to cobbler Tom, of the unexpected visitant in the book-room.

As I was going out of the said room, the fat lady stood on the right hand, and a man in black on the left, withoutide the door. In passing I moved my hat. "Sir," cried the corpulent sister, pointing to the other side of me, "That is Mr Oliver."—I said, smiling, "What, my famous antagonist?" Oliver smiled and bowed. "Mr. Oliver," added I, "give me your hand: cudgel-players shake hands, though they mean to break each others' heads." He made me no verbal answer, but repeating his bow, shook me by the hand, and seemed pleased. As I was not willing to have quite a silent meeting on his part I began afresh: "Your complexion, Mr. Oliver, seems to indicate too close an intenseness of thought. Do not study too hard, lest the sword be too sharp for the sheath." He then began to open: "Oh, sir, I do not study too closely. I do not hurry myself. I take my time." On which I told him, "As you are thrown in my way, I should be glad of a quarter of an hour's conversation with you, if you are at leisure." He answered, "With all my heart, sir: I shall be very glad:" and calling for a key, up-stairs we went to his apartment.

On entering it I saw a small table covered with printed pamphlets and written papers. Among the pamphlets was Mr. Hill's Logica Wesleyensis.—To avoid the frequent repetitions of said I, and said he; I shall throw as much of our conversation as I can recollect, dialogue-wise, under the initials of our respective surnames. Premising one remark, viz., that he strove much to draw me into a pitched debate on the Arminian points, which I was as much determined to avoid; and that for this reason, because, as none were present but himself and his wife, what I might have said would have lain at the mercy of their misrepresentation afterwards. I therefore parried him at arm's length, and was rather a hearer than a speaker.

After reconnoitering his table at my first going up, I observed to him, "So here is the whole polemical apparatus, ready to fire off. When do you intend to publish against us?"

O. It seems, sir, that you too are going to publish a book against Mr. Sellon.

T. Perhaps so; and I will give you a friendly hint. Do not be too hasty in printing your next attack. If you will have patience to wait, you may have an opportunity of killing two or three birds with one stone. You know, if we write a folio, it is but your printing a penny sheet, and we are answered at once. Nay, write but a single page, and call it an answer and we are knocked down flat.

O. Mr. Richard Hill is a very bitter abusive writer.

T. If you knew him, you would pronounce him as amiable a man as lives.

O. We once thought you the bitterest of Mr. Wesley's opposers: but, upon my word, Mr. Hill's scurrilities exceed every thing.

T. How partial are most men to themselves and to their own party! Had Mr. Hill written for Mr. Wesley, instead of writing against him, he would have been cried up by the gentlemen on your side of the question, as one of the meekest and most candid authors that ever put pen to paper, had he written ten times more smartly than he has.

O. I believe the time will come, when both you and Mr. Hill will be grieved in your minds for what you have published against Mr. Wesley.

T. Mr. Wesley, if you please, has abundant reason to be grieved for what he has published against the truths of God. I hope, for his own sake, that divine grace will make him grieve soon, and grieve deeply.

O. Mr. Wesley is a very good man, and a very honest one.

T. He has amply shewn himself so. Forgery, for instance, is honesty all over.

O. He only drew such plain inferences from Zanchy, as necessarily flow from Zanchy's principles.

T. He ought to have given the inferences as his own; and not to have fathered them upon another man.

O. Do you not think I have demonstrated that those inferences are just?

T. Do you not think that I have refuted every one of them?

O. Mr. Wesley is certainly an honest man.

T. Mr. Wesley's honesty, Mr. Fletcher's meekness, and Mr. Sellon's politeness, are very fit to go together.

O. O sir, surely you will not talk about meekness!

T. Certain I am, that your writers have no more title to arrogate meekness to themselves, than many of your preachers and perfectionists have to set up for a monopoly of holiness.

O. Sally, [or Nanny; I am not sure which]—do fetch a bottle of wine. Mr. Toplady, perhaps, will drink a glass.

Mrs. Oliver went, and returned in half a minute.

T. To shew you that I bear you no enmity, I will drink your health in a single glass.

O. I have read logic, and I have read metaphysics, and I have read natural philosophy.

T. Doubless your reading has been very extensive.

O. Oh, sir, I am no more than a cobbler, you know. You have bid me get away to my stall.

T. Certainly you are a Crispinian, though not a Crispian. Do you remember one William Gay, of Uffculm, in Devonshire.

O. Gay? Gay? Let's see. What is he?

T. A master mason. He remembers you, if you do not remember him. You lodged at his house, some years ago: and like St. Paul, preached and worked at your trade by turns.

O. It is a good many years since I was at his house.

T. I beg pardon for breaking the thread of metaphysics.

O. Why sir, I was going to say, that some metaphysical writers think the will takes the lead of the understanding. Others suppose the understanding leads the will.

T. You have read logic too.

O. Yes, indeed.

T. Mr. Wesley's three-penny cut?

O. O, much more than that. I have read several systems.

T. The poor predestinarians had need look about them.

O. Before I would be a predestinarian, I would suffer myself to be tied hand and foot, and carried through this window to yonder mad-house.

T. Should you stand in need of confinement, there would be no occasion for removing you out of your present quarters. The Foundry would answer all the purposes of a mad-house, without conveying you out at the sash. I should vote for keeping you where you are.

O. Ha, ha, ha! Well: But smartness is not argument.—Pray, sir, have you read the Assembly's Catechism?

T. Yes, sir.

O. The position with which it sets out, is, that "God hath from all eternity unchangeably ordained whatever comes to pass." I suppose, sir, you agree with those learned divines as to this particular.

T. You may possibly have seen some of my pamphlets; and, as you are remarkably pat at drawing inferences, you may from my writings infer pretty nearly how far I do or do not agree with those learned divines.

O. But, sir, their doctrine destroys all free-agency.

T. What may your idea of free-agency be?

O. Why—why—free-agents are them that can act or not act, just as they please.

T. You do not suppose that men are free, with a freedom of independency.

O. I acknowledge that men are dependent on God, as creatures. He made them, and he can put an end to their lives when- ever he thinks fit.

T. But are man's volitions independently free?

O. Most undoubtedly.

T. Men, in determining their own wills, are independent on their Maker himself?

O. They must be so, or the will would cease to be free.

T. Do not let me misunderstand you.—You hold, that men are absolutely independent on God, so far as relates to the management and actings of their own wills?

O. I believe it firmly.

T. You are honest, and consistent: but I cannot call you orthodox. You suppose man to possess a degree of independence and self-command which not an angel in heaven can dare lay claim to.—Absolute independent self-determination is an attribute truly and properly divine. If I thought you possessed of it, I should immediately fall down and worship you as a God.

O. You have it, and I have it, and every man has it, except he sins away his day of grace.—If I should say to this care [taking up my walking cane, which happened to lean near him] O cane, repent, believe, and obey the gospel, would not you think me out of my senses?

T. That I should indeed.

O. If man has not free-will, to what end are exhortations?

T. Among other useful ends, they are made instrumental, under the influence of God's Spirit, to convince men that they have, by nature, neither will nor power to do what is good.

O. I have many strong objections against that doctrine.

T. Then put your strong objections into the book you are going to publish, and we will consider them at leisure. In the mean while, let me put one question to you, which a valuable friend, now with God, once put to me.—When I was a lad of 15 or 16 years old, I was haranguing, in company, on the doctrine of free-will, as you are now. A good old gentleman rose from his chair, and coming to mine, held me by one of my coat buttons while he spoke as follows: "My dear sir, you have been talking largely in favour of man's free-agency. Allow me to leave argument and come to experience. How was it with you when God first laid hold on you by effectual grace? had you any hand in procuring it? Nay, would you not have resisted and baffled God's Spirit, if he had left you to your will?" I was more embarrassed with this question than I was willing to shew. Yet I had then too much pride to confess how much I was non-plust by this calm and single interrogation. However, before I was eighteen, God was graciously pleased to enlighten me into that precious chain of truths which, through his good hann upon me, I still abide by.—Permit me, Mr. Oliver, to put the above question to you. I trust you have experienced something of a work of God upon your heart. What say you? Did you choose God, or did God choose you? Did he lay hold on you, or did you lay hold on him?

O. I must own to you that, before my conversion, I was one of the most abandoned swearers and drunkards in England. I received my serious impressions from Mr. Whitefield. On the day of the evening in which I first heard him preach, I suppose I had not sworn so few as forty profane oaths.

T. Then it is very clear that your conversion, at least, was not conditional.

O. I will not say that I procured grace of myself. Nor will I say how far I might have resisted it.

T. I plainly perceive that you are not disposed to return a direct answer to my first question. But if you will not answer it to me, let me request you to take an early opportunity of answering it on your knees before God in prayer. Go to your closet, and pour out your heart in his presence, and beg him to shew you whether you were converted by free-will, or by free-grace alone.—To this he gave little or no reply.

At my coming away, I said: "I am going to mention a circumstance, of no importance in itself, but of some consequence to your own reputation as a man of integrity. I should have deemed it no sort of blot, had I been, what you have rashly represented me in print, a native of Ireland. Thousands have been born in that country whose shoes' latchet I am unworthy to loose. With regard to myself, however, your conjecture was a mistaken one. If you doubt it, consult the register book at Farnham in Surrey. My sole motive for setting you right in so insignificant a particular is, that you may for the time to come, be more cautious of publishing uncertain anecdotes.

He very civilly attended me down stairs, to the Foundry door. As we passed through the preaching-place, I observed, "This, I presume, is looked upon as your cathedral." He answered, "We have lately had it repaired. We are not without thoughts of building it anew." "A good scheme," said I: "new doctrines deserve a new place."—"Our's," he rejoined "are the true old doctrines." I added, "There we differ; but let it be our mutual prayer, that we may experience the efficacy of God's word in our hearts, and evidence the power of it by the holiness of our lives." On which we shook hands, and parted.

Upon the whole, this was a curious interview. To say the truth, I am glad I saw Mr. Oliver: for he appears to be a person of stronger sense and better behaviour than I imagined. Had his understanding been cultivated by a liberal education, I believe he would have made some figure in life.

What pleased me most, was that appearance of honesty by which he is so greatly distinguished from the old fox, Mr. John Wesley.—In person he is rather low of stature, of a full make, pale and broad faced, and considerably disfigured by the small pox. His wig was fitter for a bishop than for a shoemaker.

I am not without hope that God will lead him into the way of truth. He is, I believe, extremely sincere, and the promise runs, "them that are upright will he learn his way." Not that I suppose man's uprightness, or sincerity, is conditional of divine guidance, but where God has given sincerity, I look upon it as a token for good, and am in hopes of his graciously giving something more. As I told Mr. Oliver, in the course of our chat, "I have known as stubborn free-willers as he brought to lick the dust at God's footstool."

The Wednesday after this conversation, his curiosity led him to hear me preach at Blackfriars. My text was, Matt. xii. 21. I thought I glimpsed him; but being near sighted, was not certain. However, lest it should be he, I threw out some things in course of my sermon which I should not have mentioned if I had not thought him present. A friend of mine, Mr. Flower, of Cannon-street, happened to sit in the same pew with him. When sermon was ended, Oliver turned to Mr. Flower, and said, with much rancorous emotions, "Believe this, and be damned." Mr. Flower answered, "No sir, believe this, and be saved." Mr. Flower himself was the person from whom I afterwards learned this particular. He added that, during sermon-time, Oliver was in such uneasiness and agitation that he seemed hardly able to contain his rage. Poor dear man, if God has a set time for opening his eyes, the enmity of his free-will shall not be able to steel him against the gospel when the set time comes.

Another intimate friend of mine went, shortly after, to hear Mr. Oliver preach at one of Wesley's meeting-houses. The preacher had not forgot the penance he underwent at Blackfriars, in hearing a whole sermon on free-grace and finished salvation. "I went," said he to his auditory, "last Wednesday morning, to a famous Antinomian church in the city, to hear one of the Antinomian clergymen. I expected to have seen but very few people there. But, alas! though it was on a week-day, and a rainy morning, and though the church is large, the church was quite full. What a shame is it, my brethren, that an Antinomian preacher should have so many people to hear him, when I, who preach the pure gospel, was forced, but now, to wait a considerable time for my congregation, and after waiting long, to begin to eighteen or twenty people! I never talked to you about election, and perseverance, and imputed righteousness. I never tell you of a finished salvation. I preach the pure gospel. And yet, how backward are you to hear it! You discourage your ministers." I cannot omit one passage in the sermon, which was as follows: "My brethren, if man's free-will is nothing, there can be no room for praise or blame. If I stick a candle into this socket" (pointing to the sconce at or near the preaching desk) "am I to thank the sconce for receiving and holding the candle? nay, verily, for the socket, not being a free agent, cannot help admitting the candle that is thrust into it; and it is the same with man and grace, if grace be given irresistibly."

And so say I. Man is no more to be thanked for the grace which is given him of God, than a sconce is to be thanked for the taper which it holds. But here lies the difference; man in regeneration is made willing to receive grace, and made happy by receiving it, neither of which can be said of Oliver's sconce.

I wish, my dear sir, you may not be as tired with reading this long letter, as the enraged shoemaker was with hearing what he calls my Antinomian sermon. I must, however, do myself the justice to say, that I have not written so prolix an epistle these many years; nor are there many persons in the three kingdoms to whom I would have written a letter of half this length. I wish you would make retaliation, and revenge yourself in kind.

Every blessing be with you and your's.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXI.

TO MRS. MACAULAY.

Broad Hembury, June 11, 1773.

DEIGN to accept my best acknowledgments, madam, for your very obliging letter, which you told me awaited me in Devonshire; and which I accordingly found on my return. You do me infinitely too much honour, in condescending to solicit my opinion of the merits of your last publication. But, as my judgment is asked, I will give it without reserve. I think its merits are unspeakable, both as to substance and composition. That sedulous attention to truth, that undeviating zeal for the rights of mankind, and that nervous refinement of thought, which so eminently mark and adorn your character and writings, shine with full force in your fifth volume. Be it so that your political theory is too sublimely virtuous to be universally adopted by an age of such a cast as the present; yet are you secure of the affections and the admiration of the honest and discerning; who, though they have, in all periods of times, constituted far the smaller part of society; yet is their esteem of more weight and value, than the disgraceful applause of the weak or the interested multitude.

As greatly, madam, as I revere your uncommon talents, and as sincerely as I regard your public and private virtues, there are two or three minutæ on which I respectfully dissent. It is not, for instance, clear to me, that the levellers were a "brave and virtuous party;" nor that Cromwell was so utterly destitute of conscience and principle, as to you he seems to have been. That he was a traitor to the liberties of his country can admit of very little dispute. Yet can I perceive, in various features of his mental character, some striking symptoms of magnanimity and virtue, which leaves me in suspense as to the total corruption of his heart. You, who have penetrated into the recesses of history, with more attention than I have had opportunity of applying, and with far greater judgment than I am capable of exerting, may wonder, perhaps, at the freedom with which I venture to mention any thing relative to a province so peculiarly your own. But you must place the liberty, madam, which I have presumed to take, to the account of your own condescension, which commanded me to present you with my genuine thoughts.

I wish my honoured friend may, in her turn, prove as obedient to my request, as I have to her command. If so, you will not fail to revisit Devonshire in the course of this summer. My neighbours, Mr. and Mrs. Northcote, long impatiently for the happiness of enjoying your company again. And for myself, I hope I need not assure you, that I reap too much pleasure and improvement from the privilege of your conversation, to be distanced in the desire of seeing you, by the warmest of your admirers. Though this is a species of avarice which I deem it an honour to avow, I have still another argument to urge, infinitely superior to any motive deduced from my own self-interest as an individual. I saw, with pain, when last in London, that the closeness of that over-grown town, your want of exercise, and your intense literary application, appear to have had an unfavourable effect on your health. Consider, madam, that, notwithstanding all your past meritorious services, you are still a debtor to society. You owe yourself to your country. If you do not take care of its best citizen, you will be guilty of the highest injustice to the public. Say not, "How does this advice comport with your doctrine of predestination?" For I hope you are predestinated to take the advice; and that a predestinated old age will be the result. Our friend, Mr. Northcote, sometimes says, "Mr. Toplady believes absolute predestination; and yet he is loth to ride on horseback, for fear of breaking his neck." I answer, "True:" and, perhaps, that very fear may be an appointed means of preserving my neck unbroken. The corollary from the whole is; let Mrs. Macaulay, by coming down soon into Devonshire, consult her health, gladden her friends in the west, and shew herself just to the community. We set too high a value on the productions of your pen, to wish you to lay it aside entirely, while you are with us. We will allow you to devote your mornings to study; and I am pretty certain, that Mr. N. and myself together can furnish you with most, if not with all, the books which you may wish to consult, relative to the period on which you are now employed. If invitation will not prevail, I shall have recourse to threats. I told you, when I saw you last, that I would so pester you with letters, that you should be glad to visit us in your own defence: and I mean to be as good as my word. The present piece of prolix expostulation is a disagreeable sample of what you have to expect, from, madam,

Your's, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXII.

TO MRS. MACAULAY.

Broad Hembury, July 13, 1773.

LET a lady alone for dexterity. The king has lost by you. Your late much esteemed favour, madam (doubly valuable for being double in size), was so ingeniously folded, as to elude the vigilance of the post-office, and be charged only as a single letter. The circumstance, however, of postage, is an article that I shall never think of, when Mrs. Macaulay's improving favours are the freight. It is in obedience to your own desire, that I trouble you with an incident, in all other respects, too trivial for notice. But, as I am on the subject, I must request you, once for all, never to let a deficiency of franks lay the shortest embargo on your correspondence hither. I imagine them to be (what, considered in this relation, they indeed are) mere things of nought.

Of all the letters, madam, with which you have vouchsafed to honour me, I set the highest value on your last. Should you ask why? My answer would be, because it is the longest. That a person of your eminence, and engaged by so many avocations of usefulness and importance, should oblige me with so much of your time and attention, is an instance of condescending friendship, which reflects as much honour on your own politeness as I can receive from its effects.

Doubtless, the character of Cromwell, when contrasted with the shining benevolence and exemplary disinterestedness of Antoninus Pius; or with that gentleness, yet steadiness of wisdom, that self-denying simplicity, that discreet but noble liberality, that unrelaxing adherence to justice, truth, and equity, which (still more than even his writings) have stamped greatness and immortality on the name of Marcus Aurelius; the maxims and conduct of the English usurper, when weighed against such characters as those, cannot but appear, on the comparison, black as darkness, and lighter than emptiness itself. Much less will Cromwell's measures bear to be paralleled with the humane, the just, the wise, the improving administration of our own Alfred: who, perhaps, both as an individual and as a chief magistrate, came the nearest to moral and political perfection, of any regal character which adorns the page of secular history. I know of but one prince who would probably have outshone Alfred, I mean, Edward VI.

Yet, after all, I question if it be strictly fair to bring Cromwell to the test of such very exalted standards. Antoninus Pius, Antoninus the philosopher, Nicocles of Salamis, Alfred and Edward VI. of England, Louis XII. of France, and (perhaps) one or two more individuals, who were formed for the good of mankind, and for the honour of monarchy, are examples too severely bright for Cromwell's competition. Inexcusable as many of his principles seem to have been, and unjustifiable as the main of his conduct undoubtedly was, the peculiar exigencies of his situation might still, in some degree, oblige him to avail himself of maxims he detested, and to pursue a course of action which his heart might disapprove. In short, much allowance must be made for the times in which he lived; much for the situation in which he was gradually placed; much for that teeming train of events which appear to have drawn him in step by step; much for the embarrassment arising from those distressing alternatives to which public persons are sometimes reduced, and which frequently pose the shallowness of human wisdom; and much for the depravity of human nature itself, which it is sufficiently plain was not less operative in Cromwell than in the rest of the species. To which we may add, that persons who are actually parties in the busy scenes of political transaction are often hurried and perplexed into measures which the cool speculative politician would justly condemn: and at either the prospect or the retrospect of which the delinquents themselves would shudder. But to close this amicable controversy with a single question: What a figure would the generality of English historians (though many of them have great merit) make, if set in competition with Mrs. Macaulay's noble and spirited performance? Or, to vary the query; how should I dwindle to a span, to an inch, to a point, to nothing, if compared with a Witsius, a Turretin, a Spanhemius, a Gurnall, a Hervey! Think on this when you are for contrasting Cromwell with the two Antoninus's and Alfred.

Sorry I am to learn that your health is not improved since I had the honour of seeing you in the spring. But, though deeply concerned, I cannot wonder. The heat of the season, for some time past, has been intense, even at Broad Hembury. At London, it must be scarce supportable. You, whose constitution is almost as delicate as your mind is elegant, must have suffered much by it, aided, as I fear it has been, by confinement and application. Would to God you would receive, with your usual attention in other matters, the hint I took the liberty to give you at our last interview, viz. Write little, that you may write much.

If no entreaties can prevail with you to see the west this summer; yet be so kind to your friends and to the world as to spare yourself all you can. When you perceive fatigue and languor approaching, lay down your pen for that day; and imagine that I am at your elbow, requesting and adjuring you with all the earnest importunity of respectful friendship, to be tender of that exquisite machine which providence has formed into the distinguished tenement of so much exalted reason and virtue. Nothing exhausts the spirits and impairs the health more than the continued labour of deep historical researches. It engages for a time, all the powers of the soul, and engrosses the whole collective force of the nerves. What can be more dangerous, what more pernicious to the human fabric? Timotheus the Athenian is justly admired for having said, that, "being at the head of an army, he took care not to expose himself rashly to danger: for the life of a general is of too much consequence to be needlessly thrown away." Valuable as your history is, it is not of equal value with the historian. Besides: should the historian fail, what would become of the remainder of the history? I fear I should be the means of detaining you too long from the exercise and relaxation I recommended, were I not to cut short this free lecture, by subscribing myself with great respect,

Madam,

Your obliged, and most obedient servant,
AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXIII.

TO THE REV. DR. GIFFORD.

Broad Hembury, July 14, 1773.

I AM often reminded of my much valued and respected friend, by the highly esteemed plates of English coins with which he favoured me. I consult them very frequently; and partly on their own account, but more on his, I deservedly number them amongst my choicest literary κειμηλια.

I hope, dear sir, you have long since received the Danish sword (for Danish it more probably was) which I left for you at Mr. R.'s, when I was last in London. It was given me the first time I was in Ireland, in the year 1755, by counsellor Harding, on whose estate (in the county of Limerick, if I rightly remember) that, and some hundreds more of the same make, were dug up. I have, first and last, shewn it to many virtuosi: not one of whom could form any judgment of the metal it is of. It certainly is a very ancient weapon: and if admitted to be Danish, or Norwegian, it cannot be less than 800 or 900 years old. But you, who are so consummate an historian, know, much better than I can pretend to do, about what period those Northern plunderers ceased to infest Ireland.

Permit me to enquire into a matter of incomparably greater importance. How is your health? Have you got rid of your cough? Is your appetite returned? I expect a full and distinct answer to each of these questions.

May our gracious covenant God in Christ cause you to renew your strength, in every sense of that promise. Remember me in your petitions; let me hear from you without delay; and believe me to be, what, ab imo pectoris, I am,

Dear and Rev. sir,

Your affectionate and obedient servant,
AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXIV.

TO REV. MR. B. P. of New York.

Broad Hembury, Sept. 6, 1773.

DEAR AND REV. SIR,

YOUR very obliging favour of July 17 arrived here by the last post. Accept my thanks for the regard it breathes; and permit me to shew my sense of it by sincerely beseeching God to crown you with those important mercies, which you so affectionately wish to me, the unworthiest of his messengers.

It gives me unspeakable pleasure to perceive that you are a clergyman of the church of England. I should have received so valuable a letter as your's with respect and with joy, of what denomination soever the writer had been. But I confess I am so far partial to our own hill in Zion as to rejoice peculiarly when I hear of faithful, spiritual, well-principled watchmen being stationed on her walls. I know not how it is in America; but sure I am that here their number is, comparatively, exceeding few. Yet has God favoured us, of late years, with a manifest revival: and I had the satisfaction, when last in London (viz., about three months ago) of seeing six or eight evangelical clergymen, lately ordained, whom I had not, until then, so much as heard of. May the little leaven, in God's due time, leaven the whole lump.

Your idea of Mr. J. W. and his associates exactly tallies with mine. Abstracted from all warmth, and from all prejudice, I believe him to be the most rancorous hater of the gospel-system that ever appeared in this island. I except not Pelagius himself. The latter had some remains of modesty; and preserved in the main some appearances of decency: but the former has outlived all pretension to both.—Have two pieces, written by my learned and religious friend, Mr. Richard Hill, found their way to America? The one is entitled, "A review of all the Doctrines taught by Mr. J. W." The other, "Logica Westleiensis." If you have not seen them, they will give you unspeakable satisfaction.

I am glad, for the truth's sake, to hear that my translation of Zanchius was so well received, and has been reprinted, on your side of the Atlantic. God bless it there, as he has graciously vouchsafed to do to many in England.—It was quite a juvenile exercise; accomplished about a year and half before I entered into orders, by way of filling up a few supernumerary hours. I remember shewing the manuscript, one day, to the late Dr. Gill, when he did me the favour of a visit. He advised me to publish it: but, to say the honest truth, I was then not sufficiently delivered from the fear of man: and it slumbered by me from 1760 to 1769. I literally fulfilled Horace's direction (though from a motive not at all allied to that for which he recommends it) —nonumque prematur in annum.

I can never sufficiently bless God for giving me to see the day when I can truly affirm that I care not whom I displease when the inextinguishable truths of his gospel are at stake. His providence has rendered me independent on any but himself; and his grace enables me to act accordingly. I must likewise add, as a still further motive to my gratitude, that the bolder I am in his cause, the more he gives me the affections of those to whom I minister, and with whom I am connected. Where I have lost one friend by standing up for Christ, I have gained a multitude.

The anonymous pamphlet to which you refer is the production of one Mr. W—S—; who was originally, it seems, a baker by trade; he then became a lay-preacher of Mr. W.'s; and in process of time Lady Huntingdon got him into orders. She is now extremely sorry that she did so: for her ladyship is convinced, at last, that her tenderness for Mr. W. was sadly misplaced.

Though, as you justly observe, Mr. S—'s low libel is not, in any respect whatever, a real answer to my Vindication of the Church of England from Arminianism; yet have I taken the opportunity which his virulence has afforded me, of setting the essential and absolute Calvinism of the Church established, in a still fuller and stronger point of view. My piece, which is now far advanced in the press, is entitled, Historic Proof of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England. If Providence spare me to see it out of the press, I will direct my bookseller, pursuant to your request, to leave a copy for you with our friend Mr. Gardner; and which I shall desire your acceptance of, as my present.

There is but one paragraph, dear sir, in your much esteemed letter, which gave me uneasiness. I mean the passage relating to your state of health. I cannot help feeling a most tender concern that so valuable a person, as you appear to be, should labour under the disadvantages of too delicate a machine. And yet, why do I permit such a remark to escape my pen? God best knows what he has to do with us. If brotherly affection compels me to sympathise with you; faith on the other hand, bids me leave you without fear, and without complaint, to the paternal the unerring disposal of Him who does all things well.

Be so kind as to indulge me with a line, by the first opportunity, after your receipt of this. One reason for which request is that I may know what pamphlets of mine you have met with, which I beg the favour of you to enumerate; that I may, by the channel you have pointed out, send you such of them as are in print, and which you may not already have seen.

Grace be to you, sir, and love, with faith from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. May the enlightening, the comforting, the sanctifying, the sealing, influences of the eternal Spirit be your strength, your song, and your ever-present portion, all through the course of your pilgrimage.—Excuse this inaccurate acknowledgment, written currente calamo; and believe me to be

Your obliged, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

P. S. Why do you express so much diffidence of publicly taking up your pen in the cause of God? He seems to have strongly breathed the desire into your heart: and your letter fully convinces me that he has endued you with abilities for such a work. I hope (and I assure you it will be in the meanwhile an article in my prayers to God) that you may be effectually inclined, and powerfully enabled, to bear your testimony against error, in a day of such rebuke and blasphemy as this. Up then, and be doing: and the Lord crown your endeavours with his blessing. Adieu.

Pray for me as I also for you.

LETTER XXV.

TO THE REV. MR. ROMAINE (then at Tiverton).

Broad Hembury, Sept. 11, 1773.

MANY thanks to dear and honoured Mr. Romaine, for his obliging favour of to-day, just received from Tiverton. I bless God for bringing him safely thither, and for the expectation of hearing him at my church, both parts of the day, on the 19th instant: of which I shall gladly give notice to-morrow. — Mrs. R. and yourself will, I hope, give me the pleasure of accommodating you both, as well as my bachelor's house will permit, as many days next week as you conveniently can, antecedently to the Sunday above-mentioned. For which purpose I shall take care to be at home; or at the utmost within call.

God's Holy Spirit come with you, and speak by you, and bless you to this people. You will sow on ploughed ground: and cannot offend the generality of my hearers, preach free and finished salvation as strongly as you will. May you be enabled to reach their hearts.

With affectionate respects to dear Mrs. Romaine, I subscribe myself, ex animo (as all my subscriptions are) ever yours,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXVI.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

Broad-Hembury, Oct. 1, 1773.

MY having spent part of the week at Exeter will account for this late acknowledgment of dear Mr. S.'s favours, which I found at my return.

You have my particular thanks, ever valued sir, for the transmission of your learned and ingenious manuscript concerning the Origin of the Human Soul. (a) I waited with some degree of impatience, for this completion of your kind promise, made when we were travelling together from Honiton to Exeter: and I must own that, though I am not proselyted, I am considerably staggered by the arguments you bring. The strongest of which, in my idea, is that drawn from the eternal generation of God the Son. This, certainly, if anything, bids fairest for turning the scale in favour of the hypothesis you so heartily adopt, and so ingeniously defend. Nor can I answer to the inference you deduce from that topic.

I must, however, with all the respect and tenderness so justly due to my excellent friend, suspend my judgment concerning the whole matter: as I have hitherto been always forced to do; and as no less a man than St. Austin did to the end of his life. Yet, though not determined to either side of the question (non nostrum est tantas componere lites) I own myself inclinable to believe that souls are of God's own immediate creation and infusion. Difficulties, both many and great, do, without doubt, clog the wheels of this opinion. But those which embarrass the ψυχογονια, seem at present to me both more and greater. I know not, for instance, how to reconcile it to such Scriptures as Eccles. xii. 7.; Zech. xii. 1.; Heb. xii. 9. Nor can I conceive how soul can generate soul, without supposing the soul to have partes extra partes: and if we once grant its divisibility, what becomes of its absolute immateriality, together with its essential incorruptibility, and its intrinsic immortality? Neither can my dear friend ascertain from which of the two parental souls a third is educed: whether from the father's only, or from the mother's only, or by a decisione utriusque. As little can it be explained how one or two souls can produce many. The usual simile of "candle being lighted by candle," will here give us no light at all. One candle, it is true, is able to light up a hundred others; but not sine intermissione materię proprię. It actually communicates some of its own luminous particles to the candle or candles which it enflames. But can we say this of the soul, and at the same time maintain its spirituality? These, my dear sir, are a specimen of the difficulties which will not allow me to adopt the ψυχογονια; and which induce me to consider the ψυχοκτισις as the less exceptionable scheme of the two.

After all, it may perhaps be best for us, as humble Christians, not to launch too far into the immense ocean of too curious speculation. God's word is the believer's chart. God's Spirit is the believer's pilot. Where the former ceases to describe our path, and the latter to shape our course, it will utere conduce to the simplicity and joy of faith, to limit our enquiries, to leave with God the

(a) The manuscript here alluded to has since been published in a series of some of the first numbers of the Theological Miscellany, by the ingenious and respectable gentleman unto whom this letter is addressed; who is held in high estimation for his integrity, piety, and benevolence, but particularly for his profound and critical researches evinced in his exhibition of divine truth.

secret things which belong to him, to keep within sight of land, and wait for all unnecessary éclaircissements until our disimprisoned souls shall ascend on angels' wings to the presence of him whose are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

And yet I wish to see your modest and elegant disquisition in print. I hope you will give it to the public; for, whether the hypothesis it asserts be intrinsically right or wrong, you treat the argument with such purity of diction, with such refinement of reason, and with such transparent piety, that it must please the philosophic, and cannot possibly offend the Christian reader.— Permit me to detain it from you a week or two longer, as I am very desirous of giving it several perusals more.

After putting your patience to so long a trial, I must not aggravate my prolixity by apologizing for it. Nor can I conclude without reminding you that you are still my debtor, by promise, for a sight of those compositions in verse, in which (by the few samples you have formerly indulged me with) I know you to possess so refined a taste. Lay me, soon, under this obligation also; though no obligations which even you are able to confer, can make me, more than I already am,

Your affectionate and devoted

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXVII.

TO MR. M. POLLARD.

Broad Hembury, Oct. 1, 1773.

DEAR SIR,

I FEAR you have long ago set me down for little less than a monster of incivility, on account of my permitting your letter to lie so long unacknowledged. I am really ashamed to review its date. You wrote it, Oct. 1, 1772. I am answering it Oct. 1, 1773. Such a seeming failure in common decency needs much candour in you to excuse it; and requires a very sufficient apology from me to extenuate it.

The truth is, your favour was, by some means or other, mislaid: and was not retrieved until a few days ago, when I was hunting among my papers. I often recollected with pain and regret that I was your epistolary debtor; but was forced to continue so, until, by recovering your address, I could know with certainty how to direct my answer.

I read that rancorous and paltry libel on the Church of England, compiled by Cornish, of Culliton, which you were so obliging as to send me: a performance raked together from a variety of ancient and modern dunghills; and exhibiting such a jumble of scurrility as was never, I believe, before crowded into so small a compass.

I cannot agree with you that it deserves a public animadversion. It is, moreover, by this time, dead and buried, in great measure. It was pity to recal it into life. Let it sink and be forgotten. The church has nothing to fear from the efforts of such an indecent scribbler, who has started nothing new; but deals in stale, borrowed cavils, which have been refuted again and again, times without number. Besides, an answer would only conduce to render both the man and his pamphlet conspicuous. It would set the former on a pedestal, and diffuse the latter into a greater number of hands.

Mr. Addison somewhere observes, there are insects so exceedingly minute that we cannot examine them without magnifying them: and compares persons who enter the lists with contemptible writers to the traveller in the fable; who, being incommoded with the noise of grasshoppers, "alighted from his horse, in great wrath, to kill them all. Which was troubling himself to no purpose; for, had he pursued his journey, without taking notice of them, they would have died of themselves in a very few weeks."

This is my chief reason for declining the task you wish me to undertake. To which I must add that my business, for several years past, has lain in another department. My call from Providence seems to be, not the assailing of those who honestly separate from a church, which (unhappily) they do not approve; but to expose the treachery, and to obviate the interested sophistry, of too many among us who, for causes sufficiently notorious, pretend to revere the church, and actually live by her breasts, while they hate her doctrines in their hearts, and labour, with all their might, to stab her under the fifth rib.

With affectionate wishes for your welfare, both here and ever, I remain,

Sir, your obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXVIII.

TO MR. BURGESS.

[Extract.] Broad Hembury, Oct. 22, 1773.

I HAVE seen so much of the religious world, and have so largely experienced how little stress is to be laid on fair appearances, that I prize with redoubled esteem the graces and the friendship of the genuine few; in which number, I am thoroughly satisfied, my valued Mr. B. stands. I am led to this remark by the recent conduct of a very flaming professor (R—, of Lyme), who has at length dropped the mask, and, with equal dishonour to the gospel and himself, proves, I fear, no other than a whited wall, and a painted sepulchre.—In short, one hardly knows whom to trust, or of whom to entertain a good opinion. But the great Head of the Church knows them that are his; and blessed be the riches of his faithful love, he will take care of his own to the end.

Mrs. W., I am afraid, will think my silence a mark of disrespect. But I am so thoroughly certain that all Zion's children shall be taught of the Lord, that I am the less solicitous to obviate her scruples respecting the doctrines of grace. God has already begun to do great things for her. He will, doubtless, go on to make her path brighter and brighter. There is no need of my holding a lantern to her steps. She is in a fair way for the kingdom: and I would have as little of human teaching enter into her experience as possible. Pray present her with my Christian salutations: and assure her of an interest in my unworthy addresses at the throne of our common Father.

The blessings of Providence and of grace continue, through mercy, to surround my path. I have no cause of personal uneasiness, but the remains of unbelief and unthankfulness. And even these shall be done away, totally and for ever, when mortality is swallowed up of life.

The richest blessings of God's covenant love be with you. I affectionately salute our friends in general, particularly good Captain T., Mr. and Mrs. S—r, Mr. and Mrs. S—y, and Miss B. Write to me as often as you can. And though my many engagements may not always permit me to return you letter for letter; yet believe me to be, what I most sincerely am,

Your affectionate brother in the Lord
our righteousness,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXIX.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

[Extract] Broad Hembury, Oct. 22, 1773.

I FEEL my utter inability to debate so abstruse a point with so potent and masterly an antagonist. We are, however, both agreed, that we have souls. And blessed be God for giving us cause to believe that they are redeemed to himself, by the precious blood of his co-equal Son.

Allow me, dear sir, to repeat my request, relative to the publication of your thoughts on a subject which has exercised so few pens of eminence, and which your own is so peculiarly qualified to discuss. In short, I shall never cease teasing you until my wish is granted.

You are too generous to blame me for the slowness with which I recede from my own opinion concerning the question in dispute, or rather, for my suspense between the two opinions. I well remember that, in 1758, when I first began to discern something of the absurdities and impieties of Arminianism, my mind was in a similar state of fluctuation for many succeeding months. Dr. Manton's Sermons on the 17th of St. John, were the means through which my Arminian prejudices received their primary shock: a blessing, for which an eternity of praise will be but a poor mite of acknowledgment to that God whose Spirit turned me from darkness to light. But it was a considerable time (and not until after much prayer and much reading on both sides of the argument) ere my judgment was absolutely fixed.—I shall, when in heaven, remember the year 1758 with gratitude and joy: as I doubtless shall the year 1755, in which I was first awakened to feel my need of Christ. (b)

The origin of the soul, though not of equal importance with the doctrines of grace, yet requires much disquisition, in order to our coming at any satisfactory and solid ground whereon to rest the sole of our foot. At least, I find it extremely difficult. I see not any thing by intuition. Veritas in puteo. It most times requires much labour to draw it up: and very frequently eludes our utmost skill and pains at last. It is a comfort after all that the soul may be happy here, and saved for ever: though ignorant at present of her own immediate source.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXX.

TO MRS. MACAULAY.

Broad Hembury, Oct. 22, 1773.

As we live at a period when to be in debt, and to be in the fashion, are almost inseparable ideas, I offer no apology for the length of time during which my honoured friend's obliging letter has passed without acknowledgment.

I will go farther still, and even value myself on an omission which has, perhaps, contributed something to the public benefit. In writing to me you please and improve a grateful individual. But, as an historian, you convey pleasure and instruction to multitudes. Was I to return you an immediate answer to the favours I receive, your friendship and politeness would not fail to balance the epistolary account with equal exactness. A consideration which induces me now and then (contrary to the general maxim of the age), to consult my country's advantage, though at the occasional expense of my own.

(b) Was then 15 years of age. See his Life—Born 1740. EDIT.

With regard, madam, to Oliver Cromwell, on whom our correspondence has of late chiefly turned, I find myself silenced, though not entirely convinced, by the force of your observations. I must resign my client to your better judgment, and superior powers: unless you will permit me to compromise matters in the language of Lord Lyttleton: "By an uncommon appearance of zeal, by great address, and great valour, Cromwell first enflamed the spirit of liberty into extravagance; and afterwards duped and awed it into submission. He trampled on the laws of the nation, but he raised the glory of it; and it is hard to say, which he most deserved, a halter or a crown."

From a person whose public merits were thus equivocal, I revert with pleasure to one whose patriotic deserts no honest and capable judge can dispute. To be informed, and from so good authority as your own, that your health and strength are improved, give me far greater and solidier joy than any other information you were able to convey. I hope to be an eye-witness of their continuance, if, as I have some thoughts of doing I should spend a fortnight in London, during the ensuing winter.

I learned another piece of good news, a few days since, at H—, where our friend Mr N— acquainted me, on Mr. D—'s authority, that your sixth volume will appear early in the spring. This will be the most valuable amend you can make us for depriving us of your company, this year, in the West.

Your old acquaintance and admirer, Mr. H., has, I am told, received some disgust at L—, and is very seldom there, Lord C., however, still professes to affect that romantic sea-port; though it does not promise to yield him (as, if fame say true, he once hoped it would) a second Sir W. P., it were pity a second should ever fall to his share.

With every wish of happiness, and with the utmost sincerity of respect, I remain, Madam, your most obliged and obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXXI.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, Nov. 23, 1773.

WHEN favours received distance all power of equal return, the receiver can but barely acknowledge his receipt of them, and confess his incompetency to repay them. Your instances of friendship to me are of the above kind, both as to number and value

My returns to you, are, and must ever be, as last described.

Allow me, dear sir, so far to revive our tate amicable contest, as to intreat you not to suppress the publication of your Thoughts De Origine Animæ. Were they to appear, they might open a way for other learned and ingenious persons to ventilate the subject: which is one reason why I take the liberty to urge the request.—If I have detained your valuable manuscript too long, you may draw on me for it whenever you please; though the longer I am indulged with it, the more your debtor I shall be.—Pray have you seen Mr. Charles Crawford's Remarks on Plato's Phædon? I am told, that performance is not destitute of fire and genius, though very eccentric from the point of orthodoxy. Possibly, the perusal of it might give you occasion to enlarge your papers, on the subject we have debated, should you be prevailed with to give them to the public: in which case, the random shots of the sanguine and romantic West Indian may be of service to the church of God, by being turned into a contrary direction. Do think of this seriously.

I reckon myself so interested in whatever relates to you, that I cannot help intimating a wish, which dwells much upon my mind, concerning the treatise you have in hand, on the proper divinity of our adorable High Priest and Saviour. My wish is, that you would take occasion, in the course of that work, to vindicate and establish the personality and divinity of the Holy Spirit: points which were never more necessary to be asserted and elucidated than at present; when the poison of Sabellianism begins to pour in, as a flood, even among some spiritual professors themselves.

Let me tease you with yet another request. It is, that I may be indulged with a sight of those compositions, which you mentioned on our way between Broad-Hembury and Honiton. You see, I am already so deeply in your debt for obligations received, that, like a professed bankrupt, I care not how many fresh debts I incur. Nay, I wish to sink deeper and deeper.

God give us to sink deeper into his love, and to rise higher and higher into the image of his holiness! Thoroughly persuaded I am, that themore we are enabled to love and resemble him, the more active we shall be to promote his glory and to extend his cause, with our lips, our pens, our lives, our all. Be this our business, and our bliss, on earth. In heaven we shall have nothing to do, but to see him as he is, to participate his glory, and to sing his praise; in delightful, in never-ending concert with angels, with saints who are got home before us, and with those of the elect whom we knew and loved below. I would hardly give sixpence for a friendship which time and death are able to quench. Our friendship is not of that evanid species. I can, therefore, subscribe myself.

Ever and for ever yours,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER XXXII.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, Esq

Broad Hembury, Dec. 8, 1773.

I CANNOT but smile at the ease and readiness with which we cut out work for each other. My dear friend's politeness, in so condescendingly hearkening to my solicitations for the public appearance of his masterly thoughts, should induce me, by every tie of respectful gratitude, to meet his wishes with equal facility. But I am really unqualified for the department assigned me by his partiality of esteem. My acquaintance with the fathers is too slender, and my general compass of reading far too contracted, for the undertaking you recommend. I should be master of at least Irenæus, Epiphanius, and Austin, to write, in a manner tolerably satisfactory, on so complicated a subject as a review of heretics and heresies. I have, it is true, many subsidiary helps; but I ever wish, where the nature of the case will possibly admit, to derive my informations, not at second hand, but from the fountain's head. Allow me, dear sir, to recommend the proposal to the proposer himself. The work would be as complete as any human performance can be, if you were to oblige and improve the world with the projected looking glass for heretics.

Glad I am to be informed that your Defence of the Messiah's Divinity is almost finished. My admiration is sure to be excited by every thing you write: nor shall my most sacred wishes be wanting, that God would stamp general usefulness on all your attempts for the glory of his name.

Your design of honouring and gratifying me with the first perusal of your treatise, calls for more acknowledgment than I am able to express. Next to your conversation, I can receive no higher intellectual feast than that which results from a perusal of your writings. Though self-interest, therefore, operates, in this matter, too strongly on my mind to admit of my declining so decisive a proof of your affectionate friendship; yet, that I may not be too greatly indulged at the public expense, I cannot help intimating a desire that my enjoyment of the first fruits may not prejudice the harvest; I mean, that the advanced parts of your work may be transmitted hither so seasonably as not to delay the publication of the whole.

Accept my thanks, likewise, for the promised sight of what you are pleased to style the Versus inertes. If they "give me the head-ach," I will let you know it: and, by the same rule, if they charm me into admiration, your delicacy must dispense with my telling you so.

* * * *

The subject of ordination revives my wish that you would submit to the imposition of hands. The church would then (a very uncommon thing in this age) be a gainer at the expense of the state

---

LETTER XXXIII.

TO MRS. MACAULAY.

Broad Hembury, Jan. 11, 1774.

LAST Saturday I returned from a short excursion to Dorsetshire. Though you can be no stranger to the loss which the public have sustained in the decease of Mr. Hollis, yet it is possible you may not have been apprised of the particulars by an authentic hand.

That friend of the British empire and of mankind was, early in the afternoon of New Year's Day, in a field, at some distance from his place of residence at Corscombe, attended by only one workman, who was receiving his directions concerning a tree which had been lately felled. On a sudden, he put one of his fingers to his forehead; saying, "Richard, I believe the weather is going to change: I am extremely giddy." These words were scarce off his lips, when he dropped. He fell on his left side: and, being near a hedge, his head was received by the subjacent ditch. The man (I know not whether a carpenter, or a common labourer) sprung to his assistance; and raising him from that sad situation, administered what little relief he could. The expiring patriot was still sufficiently himself to say, "Lord, have mercy on me; Lord, have mercy on me; receive my soul:" which were the last words he was able to pronounce. His lips moved afterwards: but no sound was formed. In a few seconds more his spirit was dis-imprisoned.

The frightened assistant lost no time. Leaving the corpse on the grass, he hastened away for superior help. But in vain. The lancet, when applied, was without effect.

It seems, Mr. Hollis always wished that his death might be sudden. Providence was pleased to grant his request. Was I qualified to choose for myself, and were it lawful to make it a subject of prayer, I would wish for the same indulgence whenever my appointed change may come. It is, I think, the most desirable mode of departure, where the person is in a state of grace. How happy, to be surprised into heaven! And, to surviving friends, it is but a single shock, once for all.

At the time of his decease, Mr. Hollis was ready booted, intending to ride that day to Lyme Regis. When I was there, it was my melancholy lot to occupy the chamber in which he always slept, during his occasional stay in that town, and which had been prepared for his reception, two or three nights before. It was at the Three Cups: an inn which he purchased a few years ago.

How black is the ingratitude of human nature! Though this valuable man lived entirely to the benefit of others, and may be classed with the most public-spirited worthies that ever breathed; yet I have seldom known a death so little regretted by the generality. An eminent foreigner was of opinion that "there is no such thing as friendship in the world." Had he said, "there is not much," he would have hit the mark.

With fame, in just proportion, envy grows:
The man that makes a character makes foes."

Very exalted virtue is often admired: but not often loved. What is the reason? Because few are truly virtuous. And we must have some virtue ourselves, ere we are capable of loving it in others, or of loving others for it.

You knew and esteemed Mr. Hollis's virtues; nor (which is one of the highest encomiums his memory can receive) was he unworthy even of your friendship.

Allow me, madam, to express my wish, that the precious blood and the imputed righteousness of the adorable Messiah, who lived and died for sinners, may present you, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment, faultless and complete before the uncreated Majesty. But for the sake of those whom, in virtue and in knowledge, you so greatly surpass; may you be long detained from receiving that crown of life, to which, I trust, the Son of God has deemed you by the atonement of his inestimable death.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXXIV.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, Jan. 11, 1774.

I WAS in Dorsetshire when dear Mr. S—'s favour, of the 4th instant, arrived here: else my thanks had waited on him much earlier than they now do, for his repeated obligations. I never was master of so useful a pocket-book as that which your last packet conveyed. Nor have I often met with compositions so pleasing and so profitable as those which your friendship was so good as to communicate under the same inclosure. But how could my dear friend (whose judgment rarely fails, unless when his own pieces are the objects of its criticism) ever think of submitting such finished performances to my corrections? No. To preserve their excellence, they must continue as they are. I must say of them, as Handel said concerning the old tune of the 100th Psalm, when he was asked to improve that consummate piece of noble music: "Was I to alter a note, I should spoil the whole."—Make your obligation complete, by favouring me with more of those elegant and devout productions. If you have copies of those already sent, I shall beg leave to keep them. If not, I shall solicit your permission to transcribe them, before they are returned.

I was once in company with Mr. McGregor, of Woolwich, whom you have honoured with your pious, benevolent, and judicious animadversions. I believe him to be a good man: but he is, certainly, a very ignorant one. If you suffer yourself to be at the beck of every conceited nibbler who dreams himself qualified to contest the plainest truths, you will have work enough upon your hands.—My best thanks are due for your valuable tract. Though, perhaps, it may conduce to render both your antagonist and his antecedent scrawlation (forgive a homely Devonshire term) more conspicuous than they might otherwise have been.

I am happy in the expectation of soon receiving your introduction to your great work. Do not suspect me of complaisance for styling it great before I have seen it. I give it that epithet, on account of the unutterable consequence of the subject on which it treats. What my unworthy judgment may be of the manner in which you have treated the argument, shall, as usual, be transmitted to you, ex animo, when I have had the long wished-for indulgence of perusing the welcome packet.

Some considerable time ago, I requested my ever dear friend to restrain the overflowings of his kind partiality towards not the least grateful, but the least important, of his obliged confidants. Talk no more of a "giant" and a "dwarf," unless you will allow me to assume all title to the latter denomination. If you love me, treat me as (what I am) an ignorant, feeble, dying sinner. And, if you are so benevolent as to entertain a favourable idea of my wishes for the cause of God, keep that favourable idea to yourself in time to come.

The holidays, I suppose, will hardly be expired when this reaches your hands. Commend me, therefore, to your dear little folks. And may the children of my inestimable friend be the children of the living God!

Mr. Fletcher may fire off as soon as he pleases. The weapons of his warfare can never wound the truths of God, any more than a handful of feathers can batter down my church tower. I shall, however, be glad to see his performance when it appears. Mr. Shirley told me, when I was last at Bath, that Fletcher is to succeed pope Wesley, as commander in chief of the societies, if he should survive his holiness. No wonder, therefore, that the cardinal of Madely is such a zealous stickler for the cause. One would think that the Swiss were universally fated to fight for pay! Adieu.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXXV.

To the REV. MR. ROMAINE.

Broad Hembury, Jan. 11, 1774.

ACCEPT my thanks, honoured and valued sir, for the welcome present of your three precious volumes. May the life of faith be more and more operative in my heart, and may the walk of faith be displayed in every part of my conversation; until the great Author and Finisher of faith give me an abundant entrance into the land of sight and of glory.

I wish it was in my power to render you an acknowledgment adequate, in worth, to the kind favour you have conferred. When the printer will give my intended publication leave to appear, a copy of it, such as it is, will solicit your acceptance.

The God, whose you are, and whom you serve, lend you long to his church; multiply his mercies toward you, and cause your path to shine, with increasing brightness, to the perfect day. You give me your friendship; give me also your prayers, and consider me as

Your affectionate and obliged,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

My best remembrance waits on dear Mrs. Romaine. Miss L— expresses much concern and surprise at your having passed through Wellington without calling on her, and wishes to know the reason.

LETTER XXXVI.

To MR. —

Broad Hembury Feb 9 1774.

DOCTOR Young has an observation, which discovers, as much as any he ever made, his knowledge of human nature: "It is dangerous," I think he says, "to dive into most men deeper than the surface; lest closer acquaintance should abate our good opinion of them."

You, my dearest friend, are primus & paucis, eminent among the rare exceptions to that rule. The person who knows you best will be sure to value you most: and the longer he has the happiness of knowing you, the more must he regard and respect you. His esteem will resemble the progressive enlargements of a river, which widens and increases as it flows. I am led to this remark by a repeated perusal of your valuable manuscript. Pardon the delay, if no part of it wait on you by the present packet. Were your papers less excellent, they would be dismissed hence with greater expedition.

I did not doubt of your approving Gale's Court of the Gentiles. It is indeed a treasure. Though I think, in some cases, the learned and devout author winds up his darling hypothesis too high, in supposing that the Jews, during the very infancy of their nation, were the sole lumina terræ, or the fountains from whom the Egyptians and other eastern literati derived the substance of their erudition. I likewise agree with you, that he might have displayed more judgment in arranging his materials: which (like what Mr. Addison observes concerning Solomon's Proverbs) resemble a superb amassment of pearls, rather piled into a magnificent heap, than regularly strung and artificially disposed. However, it is easy to criticise. But to compile such a performance was not attended with equal facility: hic labor, hoc opus.

Did you ever meet with a tract, written by Witsius, and entitled (to the best of my remembrance) De Trinitate Judaica? It is the only part of his Latin works which I have never been able to procure. I dare believe it would be worthy of your perusal: as every thing of his is peculiarly learned, elegant, and judicious. Possibly, if you enquire among your literary friends, some of them may get you a sight of that very scarce dissertation. Marcus mentions it, in his Oration at Witsius's interment.

Thanks to you, dear sir, for the newspaper extraordinary, which contained several particulars deserving of attention. The anecdotes related of Richard III's illegitimate son, are so curious, and wear such an aspect of probability, that I thought them worth cutting out, and have pasted them on a blank leaf of Walpole's Historic Doubts. The minutes of Dr. Samuel Johnson's Tour to Scotland are perfectly in character. He is the very original there delineated. I have some personal knowledge of him: and, however I dissent from various of his principles, nor can avoid smiling at some of his not unpleasing oddities, he still passes with me for one of the ablest and honestest men who now adorn the republic of letters. Mr. Hollis's character is, I think, prodigiously overcharged, and the panegyric beyond measure excessive: though he certainly was a very valuable member of society, and his decease awakened in me much of that painful sensibility which I heartily wish I could divest myself of. I stood obliged to him for a number of scarce and curious tracts relative to the time of Charles I., and he would have favoured me with incomparably more solid tokens of his esteem, had I been capable of feigning myself a republican, and of dissembling my sincere attachment to the Scriptures and to our ecclesiastical establishment.

I tremble, with you, for the event of things in America. But the kingdom of Providence rules over all. This is as much of politics as I almost ever ventured to write. Vox audita perit: Litera Scripta manet. Adieu.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XXXVII.

To Mrs. MACAULAY, at Bath.

Broad Hembury, Feb. 18, 1774.

HAD I not lived long enough in the world to cease from wondering at any thing, I should have more than wondered at the incident of which you so justly complain. If almost any pen, except your own, had informed me of Mr. —'s ingratitude and injustice, I should have questioned the reality of the fact. I am sorry, still more for his sake than for your's, to find it so authentically attested. Well may Scripture (a book which you, madam, are too wise and too virtuous to despise) say, What is man!

Pity it is, that, on such occasions as the present, you are not divested of that exquisite sensibility which, at your own expense, adds too much honour to the remembrance of a social delinquent. Forget it all, and, as you are more than female in understanding, be more than masculine in fortitude. Triumph over the irritating savageness of the cynicism which has requited you so ill, by opposing to it the iron apathy of the portico.

Do more, rise into a still nobler revenge, namely, by centering your expectations in Him, who never disappoints those desires of which his Spirit is the gracious Inspirer.

“Lean not on earth: 'twill pierce thee to the heart:
At best, a broken reed; but, oft, a spear.”

On its sharp point, peace bleeds, and hope expires.”

Only the experienced favour and the felt possession of God in Christ can fill the vast capacities of a soul like yours. Enjoy his communicated smile:

“Then bid the earth roll: nor feel the idle whirl.”

May Bath have a happy effect on the health of a person so important to the community. You tell me your stay there will be of considerable duration. I think to see London some time in April. Should you continue at the Western Bethesda, until the latter end of that month, or until the beginning of May, I will take Bath in my return to Devonshire, by way of seeing how the waters have agreed with you.

Let me submit a single caution to your candour, viz. Be careful not to renew your acquaintance with the dapper doctor; and, above all, beware of being seen with him in public.

—Hic niger est: hunc tu, Romana, caveto.

He would derive lustre from you; but like a piece of black cloth, he would absorb the rays, without reflecting any of them back. The world is very malicious: and a character so eminently conspicuous as your's is a mark at which envy and censure delight to seize every opportunity of discharging their arrows.

As you give me hopes of seeing you in this country, during the course of the ensuing summer, who knows but I may have the honour of escorting you hither, through the whole length of Somersetshire? But I must not detain you from the pump-room, by my tedious speculations. So, for the present, farewell. God give you good spirits; for where they lead the van, good health generally brings up the rear.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P.S. I could wish you acquainted with Mrs. Derham, of Green Street, Bath. You would find her one of the most sensible and amiable women in that city. She has all the genuine ease, without any of the affected grimace, of politeness; her husband is a wine-merchant, and she has a lovely daughter, nearly the age of your's.

LETTER XXXVIII.

To THE REV. MR. DE COETLOGON

Broad Hembury, April 5, 1773.

DEAR SIR,

I RECEIVED your late favour; and am much your debtor, as well for your obliging partiality to my humble efforts in behalf of God's truths, as for the politeness with which you express it.

Were I situate near the capital, I should with much readiness accede to your request, by contributing my assistance towards carrying on the Gospel Magazine: but I find it so very inconvenient to have any concern with printing at so remote a distance, that I shall probably, in future, publish no more, in any way whatever, than absolute occasion may require. With best remembrance to your most amiable bride,

I remain your affectionate servant,
AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER XXXIX.

To Mr. G. F.

Broad Hembury, April 3, 1774.

LONGER time is usually allowed for the payment of large debts than of trivial ones. By parity of argument, a delay of correspondence on the side of him who has received great epistolary obligations is the more venial on that very account. If my valuable and valued friend will not admit this reasoning to be fair, I must own that I have nothing better to urge in extenuation of my having so long omitted to thank him for his last welcome and much esteemed favour. Yet, as some degree of imperfection is connected with every thing human, I must likewise confess, that I cannot extend my thanks for those strokes of undue panegyric with which, dear sir, your kind partiality so profusely honours me. Sincerely I say it, (and it may be said, once for all) that I would much rather be told of my real faults than of those supposed excellencies which the extreme benevolence of my friends is so ready to place to my account. Candour and politeness, like your's, first illuminate every object on which they shine; and then ascribe to the object itself, those communicated rays of which it is no more than the humble and obliged receiver.

Let me now advert to a superior subject: and thank you for the improving particulars, so kindly forwarded, concerning the lamented decease of our honoured and deserving friend, the late truly excellent Mr. Hitchen; that amiable and precious man of God, whose grace was as solid, as his parts were shining. His steady faith, and his calm unruffled departure, amidst such circumstances of bodily pain, can only be attributed to that everlasting love, and to that atoning blood, which made him more than conqueror. Looking, the other day, into my book of occasional collections, I found two remarks, which dropped from Mr. Hitchen, in a conversation I had with him, July 18, 1769; and which were well worthy of being preserved from oblivion. They run, verbatim, thus:

“The greater our sanctification is, and the more advanced we are in holiness, the more we shall feel our need of free justification.”

“An architect cannot say to his rule, to his line, or other instrument, ‘Go, build a house.’ He must first take them into his own hand, ere the wished-for effect will follow: ‘What the ministers of God, but mere instruments? And if ever they are useful in building up the church of Christ, it is his own hand must make them so.’”

Such improving observations as these; such valuable relics of saints indeed; are too precious to be lightly forgot. May they be engraven on our hearts!

I rejoice to hear of dear Mr. Ryland senior's liberty and sweetness in his ministrations to Mr. H——'s widowed flock. Our Northampton friend is an Israelite without guile; and he is among those who stand highest in my regard. He blames me for seldom writing to him: but, was I to correspond regularly, even with my first rate favourites, I should do nothing more than write letters from morning till night. In heaven we shall be all together, for ever and ever.

Make my affectionate respects acceptable to dear Mrs. F——, &c. Grace, mercy, and peace; bright evidences, sweet experiences, and growing holiness; be your portion, their portion, and the portion of

Your affectionate servant in Christ,
AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER XL.

To Mr. H.

Titchfield-street, London, May 23, 1774.

[Extract]

YESTERDAY afternoon, being Whitsunday, curiosity led me to hear Mr. Theophilus Lindsey, who lately resigned the vicarage of Catterick. I took care to be there before any of the service began, in order to hear what that gentleman calls the reformed liturgy: but what may more truly be termed, the liturgy deformed. It is a wretched skeleton of the old Common Prayer, shorn and castrated of its evangelical excellencies.

He preached, or rather read, a poor, dry, ungraceful harangue on Matt. xxv. 14, 15. So wretchedly was he tied and bound by the chain of his notes, that if by accident he happened to take his eye from his papers (and it happened several times) he was sure to blunder, and endeavoured, in an exceedingly confused and embarrassed manner, to gather up the broken thread as well as he could. He is a palpable Arian in his ideas of Christ's person; and appears to be a thorough-paced Socinian, as far as concerns the doctrine of atonement. Yet God forbid that I should judge and condemn him. To his own master he must stand or fall. But I must observe two things: 1. I bless the grace of God for giving me eyes to see, and a heart to value, the inestimable truths of his holy gospel: 2. I never prized our good old liturgy, and the precious doctrines of the reformation, more than on hearing Mr. Lindsey's liturgy and sermon yesterday. No man (as our Lord observes) having drunk old wine, straightway desireth new: for he saith, the old is better.

Mr. Lindsey's Arian meeting is held in Essex-street, up one pair of stairs, in the house called Essex-house. It is a long narrow room (which, if filled, would hold about two hundred people) where auctions (particularly for books) used to be held. He seems to be a man of much personal modesty and diffidence; and, I verily believe, acts upon principle. But he has no popular talents: no pathos, no dignity, no imagination, no elegance, no elocution. He must unavoidably soon sink into obscurity, when the novelty of his secession begins to subside, and when his Arian friends are weary of puffing him off in the newspapers. Take my word for it (and I am very glad I can truly have it to say) the church of England has nothing to fear from a gentleman of Mr. Lindsey's slender abilities. He can neither thunder nor lighten; but crawls on, quite in the humdrum way; and is no more qualified, either by nature or attainments, to figure at the head of a party, than I am to undertake the command of a navy. One of my company (for a whole coachful of us went) said to me, after service was over; "Well, I suppose you will call Mr. Lindsey's discourse a piece of arrant Lindseywoolsey." No indeed, replied I: it was mere Lindsey throughout: absolute Arianism, Socinianism, and Pelagianism, without one thread of the contrary from first to last.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XLI.

TO MRS. MACAULAY.

Broad-Hembury, July 8, 1774.

[Extract]

I ARRIVED here, from London, no longer ago than this day se'nnight; and though I was not able to take Bath in my way home, through the unavoidable length of my stay in town, I hope, madam, to be soon amply recompensed for that loss, by seeing you, safe and well, in this part of the world. Favour me with a line: and God grant it may import these two things: 1st, That all your complaints are completely annihilated by the Bath waters; and, 2ndly, That you have begun to take the previous measures for your intended two months' excursion to Devonshire.

I left good Mr. Ryland behind me in London. He desired his best remembrance to you: and wishes (in his lively manner)

"that you may be a perfect idiot once in every twenty-four hours, and incapable of writing, reading, thinking, or conversing, viz., from ten at night, until six or seven in the morning:" that you may not impair your health by sitting up late. No friend, I verily believe, has more respect and esteem for you than he: not even your obliged and obedient

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. One day, when Mr. Ryland and I went to Islington, to dine with Mrs. Bacon, he took that opportunity of introducing me to Mr. Burgh, author of the "Political Disquisitions." I saw him to great disadvantage, as he was in much pain, and in a very ill humour. The interview, on the whole, was a curious one. I was hardly seated, when he said to Mr. Ryland, concerning me, "This gentleman, I apprehend, is an antagonist of Mr. Lindsey's." I answered for myself, No, sir; I am not, indeed, of Mr. Lindsey's principles, but I look upon him, with all his mistakes, to be an honest man: and I respect an honest man, be his opinions what they will. By degrees, our conversation grew rather engaging: and Mr. Burgh seemed, for a while, to feel a truce from the torments of the stone, and assume some degree of good-nature. But I should have had a sharp onset, if he had been in perfect health. Even as it was, he could not forbear feeling my pulse, on the article of freewill. In the course of our debate, I drove him into this dreadful refuge, viz., that "God does all he possibly can [these were Mr. Burgh's own words] to hinder moral and natural evil, but he cannot prevail; men will not permit God to have his wish." Lest I should mistake his meaning, I requested him to repeat those terms again: which he did. Then the Deity, said I, must needs be a very unhappy being. "Not in the least," replied Mr. Burgh. "What! (rejoined I) disappointed of his wishes, embarrassed in his views, and defeated of his schemes, and yet not be unhappy?" "No," rejoined Mr. Burgh: "for he knows that he must be so disappointed and defeated, and that there is no help for it: and therefore he submits to necessity, and does not make himself unhappy about it." A strange idea this, of the Supreme being! At coming away, I told Mr. Burgh, that however he might suppose God to be disappointed of his will, I hope the public would not be disappointed of the remaining volumes of the Political Disquisitions yet unfinished. And, in very truth, madam, your friend Burgh is much better qualified for political disquisitions than either for theological or for metaphysical ones. Adieu.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XLII

TO THE REV. MR. MADAN.

Broad Hembury, July 8, 1774.

[Extract]

ENOUGH of business. Now for chit-chat. My few horæ subsivivæ, since my return hither, have been devoted chiefly to the perusal of Lord Chesterfield's Letters. I should think the better of my own judgment if it should be so happy as to coincide with your's. Mine is, in general, that they are not only, what his lordship terms, "letters written from one man of the world to another;" but, many of them, such as might well be expected from a decent civilized fornicator to his favourite bastard. Do you not also complain of his negligence, in point of style, composition, and connection; really to be wondered at, in even the running productions of so masterly a hand? It is true, letters are but conversation committed to paper: yet, I believe, the generality of well-bred people would blush to converse in a style equally inaccurate and desultory, with that in which Lord Chesterfield sometimes wrote.

I own myself, however, on the whole, extremely entertained and improved by this publication. There are almost an infinity of rules and remarks, respecting both men and les manières, founded on the deepest worldly wisdom and truth; yet, so intermixed with dross and refuse, that, had I the care of a young person, I would not venture to put those letters into his hands, without the precaution of an index expurgatorius.

But was any thing ever like his portrait of the female sex, in letter 129? Where he traduces them all, without making a single exception. I know but one way to bring him off; and that, I fear, will be far from doing it effectually: viz., by supposing that, when he sketched that caricature, his mind was acidulated by a recent fracas with Lady Chesterfield, and that, in revenge, he instantly libelled the whole sex.

I never heard of Mr. Wesley's Sinai-Covenanters until you were pleased to mention them. Poor creatures! to meet once a year, and solemnly bind themselves to keep the whole law! I wish I had known this particular some months ago. Can you tell, whether they have a written form of covenanting, or whether it be all ore tenus? and, if the former, whether it be possible to procure a sight of it? This is a matter well worth enquiring into.

You once favoured me with a more critical explication of Pet. i. 19. than I had before met with. I wish you would condescend to give it me in writing.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XLIII.

TO THE REV. MR. ROMAINE.

Broad Hembury, July 8, 1774.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,

As it is possible that our valuable and valued friend, Mr.—, may not hitherto have had an opportunity of acquainting you with the polite manner in which Lord — received your late favour; and as Mr. — has been so good as to communicate to me, in a letter received here yesterday evening the substance of what passed, permit me without delay,

1. To inform you, in general, that your kind application appeared to have a very favourable effect: and that his lordship was so obliging as to say he would "try the ground" with the Lord Chancellor.

2. To thank you, under providence, for the very friendly intervention of your good offices: which, whether crowned with ultimate success, or not, I shall ever most affectionately remember.—And,

3. To request an exertion of your interest with that blessed and only Potentate, who has all power both in heaven and earth, that he would graciously give such an event to this whole matter, as he will be pleased to bless most to the glory of his own name.

I returned hither, from London, this day se'nnight: and, last Tuesday, attended the bishop's visitation at Tiverton. The sermon was preached by Mr. Laud: and, upon the whole, a very excellent one it was. Among its few flaws was the classing of Hutchinson with Clarke, Shaftesbury and Hume: the former of whom, if living, would have been very sorry at being put among such company. The Strand divines were, rather severely than smartly, taken to task: and, as I was afterwards told, old Whitter and young Wood held down their heads in some confusion.

The episcopal charge, though extremely concise (i. e. dispatched in about 12 or 14 minutes), was the very best I ever heard. It chiefly turned on the excellency of the XXXIX articles: the expediency of subscription, and the peculiar duties, more than ever, at this time, incumbent on the clergy, relative to their morals, manners, dress, and abstractedness from the world. The whole of his lordship's behaviour, both in the church, and afterwards at dinner, gave much satisfaction to the generality, and peculiar pleasure to me.

Adieu, honoured and dear sir. Kindest respects to yourself, and to Mrs. Romaine, from

Your obliged and affectionate

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XLIV

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, July 8, 1774.

SHALL I attempt to thank my ever dear and ever respected friend for his polite and obliging favour of the 30th ult., or for the kind services which preceded that favour, and to which it refers? No. It is a duty to whose performance I feel myself unequal. Your friendship, therefore, like what some say concerning virtue at large, must be its own reward. Yet think me not insensible. My sensibility is the very cause of the omission. Were the obligations under which you lay me more moderate, I could with ease thank you for them: but as the case stands, I must follow Horace's direction, consule quid valearit humeri; and not aim at impossibilities.

Sure I am, that God will incline the scale (and not this only, but every other, to the end of time) so as shall conduce to his own glory, and to the accomplishment of his own purpose. It is ours to use the means, in a dependance on his absolute providence; to bless the means used, is his. With him, all events must be ultimately rested: and I trust I can say, ex animo, with him I ever wish and desire to rest them; nor would I have a single incident removed out of his hand, were I possessed of all power both in heaven and earth.

You kindly remind me "To strike while the iron is warm." In answer to which I must observe, that I have written, to-day, to Blackheath and to Epsom. Can you suggest any other advisable steps? You will find not only my ear, but my heart, ever open to the least hint suggested by a friend of your wisdom and faithfulness, whether the subject relate to my own interest or not.

You are so good as to enquire after my safe return into the West. I bless God, my journey was both safe and pleasant. The slightest mercies ought to be thankfully received and noticed: for they are as absolutely undeserved as the greatest. We can no more merit a moment's ease, or safety, or happiness, in our going out and coming in, or on any other occasion whatever, than we can merit the kingdom of heaven.

I travelled with a very old (or rather, with a very early) acquaintance; an officer of the 21st regiment: with whom, at our first setting off in the coach from London, I had an hour or two's controversy, concerning the lawfulness of duelling. Your friend was on the negative side of the question: the captain on the affirmative. During the amicable skirmish (a duel against duelling), and for many hours after, we were quite ignorant of each other's names. And no wonder; for we had not met since the year 1757, when we were both lads; and time has made such an alteration in each, that neither knew the other. We travelled to Bridport (i. e. 138 miles) before we found out who was who: and I have seldom known an eclaircissement which gave more pleasure on both sides. The captain very politely invited me to see him, if I should ever go to Plymouth: and, on my asking for whom I should enquire, the discovery was made.

On a review, I am really ashamed of trespassing on your patience and time by such petty chit-chat. It is high season for me to apologize; not by prolific excuses, but by cutting matters short at once. Only observing that, if the unexpected sight of an old and valued friend on earth gives a heart-felt joy, which none but a breast formed for friendship can experience: what far more exceeding and exalted blessedness must result from that "Communion of saints" made perfect, which will obtain in the kingdom of glory!—Until then, and when there, I am, and shall ever be,

Your affectionate friend,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

LETTER XLV.

MR. O—.

Broad Hembury, July 29, 1764.

BEST thanks to you, ever dear sir, for your kind and obliging letter of the 19th instant. From what I felt in reading it, I cannot help believing that your soul was much alive to God when you wrote it. May your holiness and comforts resemble the flow of some mighty river, which widens and enlarges more and more, in proportion as it advances nearer the ocean into which it falls.

I rejoice at what you say concerning the happy frame of soul in which the Rev. Mr. Green ascended to Abraham's bosom. It is delightful to live and walk in the shinings of God's countenance: but to die in the light and consolations of his presence, is (next to heaven itself) the crowning mercy of all. How gracious is the Holy Spirit of promise thus to shine away the doubts and fears of his people, and put them to bed by daylight! O may we taste the sweetness of his love, rise into a nearer conformity to his image, enjoy closer communion with him, both in and out of ordinances, and experience an increasing sense of his never-failing faithfulness; till we receive the end of our faith, even the full and ultimate salvation of our souls. I bless the Lord I cannot doubt of his making all this our portion. He sometimes enables me to look, as it were, into his heart of everlasting love; and to catch a glimpse of that page in the Book of Life, where he has written my unworthy name: and in the strength of that comfort and travel many days.

I am very glad that dear Mr. ——— has broken the ice at Westminster. Would to God that the nasty party walls which separate the Lord's people from each other be low were every one of them thrown down. Sure I am that, in heaven, all God's house will be laid into one. Ephraim shall then no more envy Judah; nor Judah vex Ephraim.

I am greatly indebted to Mr. M—— for what he did me the honour to say of me, and of my late publication, in the pulpit. But I desire at the same time to be (and I bless God I am) humbled and abashed, instead of elevated and puffed up, by the unmerited obligations which I continually receive from the excellent of the earth. Not unto me, O Lord, not unto me, but to thy name, be the undivided glory of every gift, and of every grace ascribed.

Present my affectionate respects to dear Mrs. ———, who, I hope, has, by this time, added to your family, without danger to herself. Let me know this particular: for I bear her much upon my heart.

While your dear little daughter conues as little as she is, I may venture to send my love to her. And I wish also, to be kindly remembered to all in your house, who love your Lord and mine.

How is Miss ———? Christian salutations to her and all that family; and to as many as condescend to enquire after

Dear sir, your obliged and very affectionate servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XLVI.

To Mr. ———

Broad Hembury, Sept. 30, 1774.

EVER DEAR SIR,

THOUGH your kind politeness has desired me never to thank you by letter for the many instances of the regard with which you are continually obliging me; yet I must, for once, violate the prohibition, by acknowledging my safe receipt of the ———, &c., which you have lately added to my ———, and for which I request you to accept my cordial thanks. I wish that you and dear Mrs. ——— were here, to help to use them.

I greatly admire the elegant ——— and ———, in particular, and I pray the Father of mercies, that the sweet sentences with which the former is decorated and inscribed may be written indelibly on the hearts both of the donor and of the receiver.

Next let me thank you for your much esteemed letter of the 15th instant, and for the kind trouble you were so good as to take, in calling on Mr. ———. Whatever course the Northamptonshire affair may take, it will be in consequence of that "never-failing Providence which orders all things, both in heaven and earth." Blessed be God for enabling me, in some measure, not only to acquiesce but to rejoice in the unerring disposals of his will; and to adore with thankfulness that Infinite Wisdom which alone is able to choose our heritage and our lot.

I have not been on the mount for some days until now. The Lord warm your heart with a ray of that fire which, through the free grace of his Spirit, he at present gives me to experience. Oh, what treasures are in the blood of Christ; what safety in his righteousness! what sweetness in his fellowship! Lord, enlarge our souls to receive of his fulness more and more. If the scanty vessel of imperfect faith can draw such water of comfort from the wells of salvation; what will be the blessedness of God's elect, when they are taken up into glory, and there walk with him,

"High in salvation and the climes of bliss!"

The clearer views God gives us of interest in his covenant, and in the unsearchable riches of Christ, the deeper we sink into a humbling sense of our own vileness and unfruitfulness. The same candle of the Holy Spirit, which shews us God's love, and our part in the Book of Life, discovers to us the exceeding hatefulness of sin, and convinces us that we are hell-deserving sinners. It also fires us with an inextinguishable wish and thirst for conformity to Christ in holiness, and effectually causes us to cry out with David, "Make me go in the path of thy commandments, for therein is my desire."

Doubt not, my dear sir, but the Lord will go on to take care of us in all these respects, and in every other; even beyond the utmost we are able to ask or think.

My best remembrance wait on the amiable and deserving partner of your heart: and I do, with truth and love in Christ Jesus, subscribe myself her and you

Affectionate servant in him,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. Be so good as to present my respectful salutations to Mr. ———, whom I request to accept my thanks for the intended token of his esteem; which, when it arrives, I hope ever to preserve and value for the sake of the giver.

I shall be happy to hear from you as often as you can find leisure. Is Mrs. ———'s hour of danger past? She has my earnest prayers. Adieu.

LETTER XLVII.

To Mrs. B——

Broad Hembury, Nov. 11, 1774.

ON my receiving a letter, franked by Lord Sandwich, I immediately conjectured to whom I stood indebted for the contents : and on breaking the seal found my hope most agreeably realized. Your friendship and politeness, dear madam, are great indeed : which not only induced you to forgive my omissions, but even prevailed on you to be yourself the renewer of that correspondence which both your merit and my own promise required me to re-commence. Happy in the continuance of your esteem, and signally obliged by the accumulated favours you confer, I should be totally inexcusable, were I to persist in putting your condescension to those trials, whereof our truly valuable friend, Mr. Ryland, so loudly complains.

But what can I say relative to the profuse encomiums with which you deign to honour my late publication? Your probity is unquestionable. Your discernment in every other instance unimpeachable. I am thankful for not having displeased so refined a judge. May that adorable Being, whose Spirit alone is able to enlighten the darkness of the human mind, command his gracious blessing on every attempt which has his glory and the illustration of his truths for its objects!

A person whom we both deservedly admire has just left Devonshire, after a residence in it of no less than three months. I mean Mrs. Macaulay : who wisely intermitted her historical pursuits for the sake of pursuing that without which the former would soon come to a final period ; namely, health. I left her very weak and languid (as I believe I told you) when I parted from her last May, at Bath, on my way to London. But she has quitted this part of the west in all the vigour and alacrity of health. She is returned to Bath, where she has taken a house on St. James's Parade ; and where, if business or inclination should call you to that city, she will be, I doubt not, extremely glad to see you. I have promised to make an excursion thither, for a month or two, before winter is over, provided my studies will any way give leave : and should be happy, if you could, with convenience to yourself, contrive to visit Bath at the same time.

You tell me you have been amused at London, or rather shocked, by those vehement exertions of female zeal which, in peeresses, are no less violations of law than of delicacy. I too, was, last Wednesday, amused here in my own parish, by a scene much humbler than that which your electioneering ladies exhibited : viz., by what is called, in this country, a Skimmington ; a procession, which is very accurately described in Hudibras, and not with more humour than the real sight conveys. A most uneasy pair, whose constant jarrings, and whose frequent skirmishes (in which, however, the heroine, not the hero, generally came off victorious) have long been the talk of the parish, and a nuisance to their immediate neighbours, were mimicked and ridiculed to the life in this rustic exhibition : but accompanied with much better and softer music than the squabbles of the original couple usually afford.

I have heard you remark, and no remark was ever more just, that, let me be where I will, I am sure to meet with instances of connubial infelicity. They really occur to me on every hand, just as "the graces" bolt from every corner on the perusers of Lord Chesterfield's Letters. And yet (you will smile, if not triumph, at such a declaration from me) I am really and literally tired of being a bachelor ; not unwilling to try a certain hazardous experiment ; though half afraid to venture.

After giving such a voluntary and decisive proof of my sincerity, I cannot be suspected of duplicity, if I subscribe myself, what in very truth I am,

Dear madam, your obliged friend, and most obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. Good Mrs. Ch. has my respectful and affectionate remembrance. God loves her, and will take care of her, even to the end, and without end.—Adieu.

LETTER XLVIII

TO THE REV. DR. B. of Sarum.

Broad Hembury, Nov. 18, 1774.

As I suppose you are, by this time, returned from Freshford, it is incumbent on me, dear sir, to acknowledge your favour of the 9th ult., which arrived here a day or two after my last to you was forwarded to Sarum. I should have been extremely happy to have enjoyed your and Mrs. B.'s company in Devonshire, but cannot wonder at my disappointment when I consider the superior attractions of which Freshford and its environs have to boast. Another year, I hope, will make me amends.

Mrs. Macaulay has lately left us, in a more vigorous state of health and spirits than I ever yet remember to have seen her enjoy. Notwithstanding the many local and social charms of Freshford, you have really sustained a loss by not being here during her long residence in this neighbourhood.

I shall be extremely obliged to you for communicating the Jamaica epitaph on Bradshaw. Though, before I see it, I must inevitably set it down for an mere lusus ingenii ; the person from whom you had it being most egregiously misinformed, if he in earnest believes that the subject of it died in that island where the epitaph was born. Certain it is that Bradshaw died at London, in November, 1657, the year before Cromwell expired: and that he [Bradshaw] was interred in Henry VIII's chapel; Mr. Rowe, the famous Puritan minister, preaching his funeral sermon, in Westminster Abbey, from that text in Isaiah, The righteous perisheth, and no man lays it to heart. Moreover, Bradshaw's remains were, soon after the Restoration, dug up, and buried under the gallows, with those of other partisans in the same cause. So that your West Indian correspondent is totally mistaken in every point of view. But pray let me see the epitaph: which is no more the worse for the mis-information with which it was introduced to your acquaintance, than the intrinsic merits of Mr. Drelincourt's excellent Treatise on Death are impaired by the fabulous legend prefixed to it, concerning Mrs. Veal's apparition.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER XLIX.

TO THE COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 9, 1774.

MADAM,

I WAS, in due course, honoured with your ladyship's letter of Nov. 24; and, had its contents been less weighty, should have sooner acknowledged my receipt of it.

After so condescending and so explicit a display of your views of divine things, I should be criminally inexcusable, were I not, with all possible respect, but yet with the most naked and undisguised simplicity, to submit the result, both of my prayers and of my reflections, to your ladyship's judgment and candour.

I consider the true ministers of God as providentially divided into two bands: viz., the regulars, and the irregulars.

The former may be compared to centinels, who are to keep to their stations: or to watchmen, whose attention is immediately confined to their respective districts. The latter, like troops of light-horse, are to carry the arms of their sovereign wherever an opening presents or occasional exigence may require. Both these corps are useful in their distinct departments; and, in my opinion, should observe the same harmony with each other as obtains among the stationary and planetary stars, which are fixed and erratic in the regions above us.

Hitherto, I have considered myself as a regular: and have been very cautious not to overstep that line into which, I am persuaded, Providence has thrown me; and in which, I can thankfully affirm, divine grace has been pleased to bless me. Ought I not to see the pillar of divine direction moving before me, very visibly, and quite incontestibly, ere I venture to deviate into a more excursive path?

I remember that, in one of my last conversations with dear Mr. Whitefield, antecedently to his last voyage to America, that great and precious man of God said as follows: "My good sir, why do not you come out? Why do not you come out? You might be abundantly more useful, were you to widen your sphere, and preach at large, instead of restraining your ministry to a few parish churches." My answer was to this effect: that "The same Providence which bids others roll at large seems to have confined me to a particular orbit."

And, I honestly own, I am still of the same mind. If there be, for me, a yet more excellent way, God, I trust, will reveal even this unto me. I hope I can truly say, that I desire to follow his guidance with a single eye.

As to the doctrines of special and discriminating grace, I have thus much to observe: that, for the first four years after I was in orders, I dwelt, chiefly, on the general outlines of the gospel, in the usual course of my public ministry. I preached of little else but of justification by faith only in the righteousness and atonement of Christ; and of that personal holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. My reasons for thus narrowing the truths of God were (with humiliation and repentance I desire to speak it) these two: 1. I thought these points were sufficient to convey as clear an idea as was absolutely necessary, of salvation. And 2. I was partly afraid to go any farther.

God himself (for none but he could do it) gradually freed me from that fear. And as he never, at any time, permitted me to deliver, or even insinuate, any thing contradictory to his truths; so has he been graciously pleased, for between seven and eight years past, to open my mouth to make known the entire mystery of his gospel, as far as his Spirit has enlightened me into it. The consequence of my first plan of operations was, that the generality of my hearers were pleased: but very few were converted. The result of my latter deliverance from worldly wisdom and from worldly fear (so far as the Lord has exempted me from those snares) is, that multitudes have been very angry: but the conversions which God has given me reason to hope he has wrought have been at least three for one before. Thus, I can testify, so far as I have been concerned, the usefulness of preaching predestination: or, in other words, of tracing salvation and redemption to their first source.

Your ladyship's goodness will pardon the unreserved freedom and plainness with which I have taken occasion to open my mind. Nor will you, I hope, disbelieve me when, with the same simplicity and truth, I assure your ladyship that I love and revere you for what God has made you, and for what he has ef-fectured through you. Let me have, as you kindly promise, an interest in your prayers.

Should I visit my Bath friends this winter, as I have some thoughts of doing, I will avail myself of your ladyship's invitation, by paying my respects to you; and the rather as it is now between ten and eleven years since I had an opportunity of presenting you with them in person. Whenever I have been in Bath, during this long period, your ladyship never happened to be there.

Wishing you, not the compliments of the ensuing season, but an increasing enjoyment of the realities which it brings to our remembrance, I remain, madam,

Your ladyship's most obedient, and most humble servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. May I take the liberty to wish that, when you next write to Lord Moira, your ladyship would condescend to make my respects acceptable to him. Mr. Shirley, if at Bath, has my affectionate salutations.

LETTER L.

TO THE REV. DR. PRIESTLEY.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 23, 1774.

REV. SIR,

CONDESCEND to accept the thanks of a person who has not the honour of being acquainted with you, for the pleasure and improvement recently received, from a perusal of your spirited (and, for the most part, just) Animadversions on the three Northern Doctors. Allow me also to thank, in an especial manner, the good providence of God which has raised up no less a man than yourself, to contend so ably for the great doctrine of necessity: a doctrine, in my idea, not only essential to sound and rational philosophy; but abstracted from which I could not, for my own part, consider Christianity itself as a defensible system.

Greatly as I admire the main of your performance, I should, probably, not have taken the liberty to trouble you with my acknowledgments, but for the following circumstance.

In your successful assault and battery of the new Scotch fortification, you have occasionally fired some random shot on a very numerous set of men who, so far as concerns the article of necessity, are your actual friends, and your natural allies. Permit me, therefore, sir, to offer you, in this private manner, a few plain, but not intentionally disrespectful, strictures on some rash and exceptional passages; which serve as foils, to render your penetration and candour, on some other occasions, the more conspicuous.

I shall confine myself to your Introduction.

1. Are you certain that "The common Arminian doctrine of free-will is founded on Scripture, and pre-supposed by the philosophic doctrine of necessity?" Is it not very possible, and often actually matter of fact, that men have not "the power of doing what they please, or will" to do? The triumvirate of doctors (for instance) are, I doubt not, very willing to beat you off from their intrenchments, and to give you a total defeat. But I am much mistaken if they have "the power of doing it."

2. Why are "Calvin's notions" represented as "gloomy?" Is it gloomy to believe that the far greater part of the human race are made for endless happiness? There can, I think, be no reasonable doubt entertained concerning the salvation of very young persons. If (as some, who have versed themselves in this kind of speculation, affirm) about one half of mankind die in infancy, and if, as indubitable observation proves, a considerable number of the remaining half die in early childhood; and if, as there is the strongest reason to think, many millions of those, who live to maturer years, in every successive generation, have their names in the Book of Life: then, what a very small portion, comparatively, of the human species, falls under the decree of preterition and non-redemption! This view of things, I am persuaded, will, to an eye so philosophic as yours, at least open a very cheerful vista through the "gloom;" if not entirely turn the imaginary darkness into sun-shine. For, with respect to the few reprobate, we may, and we ought to, resign the disposal of them, implicitly, to the will of that only King who can do no wrong: instead of summoning the Almighty to take his trial at the tribunal of our own speculations, and of setting up ourselves as the judges of Deity.

3. I must confess, I see nothing "wonderful," nor to be gazed at "as a strange phenomenon," in the coincidence of "philosophic necessity" with the Calvinistic theology and metaphysics. I should rather "wonder," if they did not coincide: since (according to the ideas formed by me, who live in a Christian country, and believe the Christian revelation) they mutually suppose and support each other. For what is Calvinism but a scriptural expansion of the philosophic principle of necessity? or, if you please, a ramification of that principle into its religious parts? It is possible, indeed, for a person to be a gross necessitarian, or a necessitarian at large, without being fully a Calvinist (witness many of the ancient, and some modern, philosophers;)

but it seems impossible, to me, that any person can be fully a Calvinist without being a necessitarian.

Moreover, every Christian necessitarian is, so far, a Calvinist. Have a care, therefore, Dr. Priestley: lest, having set your root in the Lemaine lake, you plunge in quantus quantus. A catastrophe which, for my own part, and for your own sake, I sincerely wish may come to pass, and of which I do not wholly despair.

4. There is, I apprehend, no shadow of reason for supposing that, had the great and good Mr. Edwards "lived a little longer, he would have been sensible that his philosophy was much more nearly allied to Socinianism than to Calvinism." That deep and masterly reasoner would rather have rejoiced at seeing so important a branch of the Calvinistic philosophy (viz. the doctrine of necessity) so warmly adopted by a Socinian divine.

Seriously, I think you have admitted a Trojan horse into your gates: whose concealed force will, probably, at the long run, display the banner of John Calvin on your walls, and master your capitol, though at present garrisoned by the confederate forces of Pelagius, Sozzo, and Van Harmen.

5. Nor was it any "piece of artifice in Mr. Edwards to represent the doctrine of philosophical necessity as being the same thing with Calvinism, and the doctrine of philosophical liberty as the same thing with Arminianism." This suggestion, sir (which, by the way, is more than a little ungenerous, when we consider how upright and valuable a man Mr. Edwards by all accounts proved himself, in every part of his conduct) seems to have been started merely as a salvo for yourself. You are, on the article of necessity, the reverse of an Arminian. And you are terribly afraid of being dubbed a Calvinist. I must own you are in some little danger. But cheer up. Your case is not yet desperate. Poor Janssenius was in a situation somewhat similar to yours. He, indeed, swam farther into the Geneva lake than you have ventured to do: and, to elude the name of heretic, assured as many good people as would believe him, that he was, all the while, bathing in the Tiber.

So far as I can judge, Mr. Edwards gave the naked and genuine sentiments of his heart to the public. And I am likewise of opinion that the fact stands, simply and literally, just as he represents it. Arminianism, when stripped of its sophistical trappings, contends for such an absolute and inviolable freedom, εν αμφοτεροις, as is independent, in its exercise, on any thing but the will itself. Consequently, the Arminian scheme is no less incompatible with the religion of reason, than with the religion of the Bible: and directly contravenes the whole current, both of natural and of revealed truth.

6. It is, certainly, a very unguarded assertion, that "the modern question of liberty and necessity" is what the Calvinist divines "never understood, nor, indeed, so much as heard of." The contrary is evincible from their writings. The question, so far from being purely "modern," has exercised some of the ablest Protestant pens, from the reformation quite down to the present day. It has been agitated, with no little zeal, pro et contra, even among the Papists, long before, but more frequently since, the Protestant æra. And it was the subject of no small debate among some of the heathen philosophers themselves.

7. Mr. Edwards, therefore, was not the "first Calvinist who ever hit upon the true philosophic doctrine of necessity." A vast number of the greatest reformed divines, both foreign and English, touched the self-same key. And it is extremely evident that Mr. Edwards himself received much light from them into the subject; and even availed himself, very frequently, of phrases, distinctions, and arguments, which those grand luminaries had, with success, made use of before him.

8. "Zealous Calvinists," you tell us, "regard your writings with abhorrence." It would have been candid, sir, to have expressed this with more restriction, and with less vehemence. Many very "zealous Calvinists" regard your writings, on some subjects, not only without "abhorrence," but with honour and admiration. Dark and "gloomy" as you have represented us, we still have sufficiency, both of eye-sight and of day-light, to discern the lustre of your genius, and the improvements which your equally profound and refined researches have added to the stock of philosophic knowledge.

9. Nervous (and, I think, irrefragable) as Mr. Edwards's treatise is, you still are much too sanguine in asserting that the Calvinists "boast of it as the strongest bulwark of their own gloomy faith." We never boasted of it under any such character. We have, in my apprehension, some hundreds of "bulwarks" no less "strong" than this American one, whose towers I concur with you in deservedly admiring. Exclusively of which numerous bulwarks, we have a citadel (the Bible) against which no weapon can possibly prevail. I pass over your favourite epithet "gloomy," which you so repeatedly prefix to Calvinistic "faith." When you have attended as minutely to the philosophy of Scripture-revision, as you have to that of animal optics, you will perceive the district of Calvin to be, not a Cimmerian region, but a very land of Goshen

10. You think proper, sir, to suppose that "zealous Calvinists will be surprised to hear" (it is well we are not deaf and blind too) "you so full and earnest in the recommendation of Mr. Edwards's book." I much question whether their wonder will mount to "surprise." There are so many weaknesses, contradictions, and inconsistencies in philosophers as well as in ordinary men, that few people who know much of the world and of human nature will be greatly "surprised" at any thing.

11. You, however, are of a different opinion. Perhaps, because "zealous Calvinists," like moles and bats, live in a thick and perpetual gloom with hardly a single ray of truth or of common sense to gild their midnight darkness. People in so melancholy a situation are doubtlessly very apt to take fright. If your charity will not pour daylight on our gloomy abodes, it would at least be compassionate in you to mitigate the woeful "surprise" with which you think your treatise calculated to impress us.

No! You will no more deign to alleviate our "surprise" than to dissipate our gloom. It is rather cruel, though, first to shut us up in the dark, and then to scare us. It seems, we "must still continue to wonder." Wherefore? Because "It would be to no purpose for you to explain to" the zealous Calvinists "Why they ought not to wonder at the matter. What I should say on that subject," adds the high and mighty doctor, "would not be intelligible to them." Inexpressibly candid and polite! The plain English of the compliment is this:

"Every zealous Calvinist is a fool, or a dunce, at best. I will therefore waste no time on such incurable asses. All my philosophic apparatus itself would not afford them a gleam of knowledge: nor all my consummate skill in language and in reasoning make them comprehend the lowest of my sublime ideas. I therefore leave them to stumble on in their impenetrable gloom: and to knock their blockish heads against tables, doors, walls, and posts, amid the tremor of their surprise."

Our case is pitiable indeed. But why will the illuminated and illuminating doctor direct a few of his rays, by way of experiment, toward our dark and dreary habitations? Behonest, good sir: and fairly tell us, that your reason, for huddling the matter up and for not descending to particulars was not our stupidity, but your fear of the consequences that would result to yourself, had you gone to the bottom of the subject, an unfolded all that was in your heart. To screen yourself, you affect to give us over as incurable before you have so much as tried what you can make of us. If you set about it, who can tell but, stupid as we are, some of us may recover our sight and sense, and be emancipated from our gloom and from our surprise together? Electricity, under your auspices, may work miracles.

However lightly I may occasionally have expressed myself, I assure you, on the word of an honest man, that I have the honour to be, with seriousness and truth,

Reverend sir,

Your admirer,

and very humble servant,

AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE TOPLADY.

P. S. On reviewing this letter, I deem myself obliged, in some measure, to apologize for that vein of freedom into which the supreme and insulting contempt you express of the Calvinists, has unwarily betrayed me. Your last quoted paragraph, sir, appears to carry an implication of extreme prejudice and of sovereign pride. Nothing can be no more supercilious, more rude, and more unjust, than the letter and the spirit of that whole passage. I would willingly, if I were able, frame an excuse for you, by supposing that it escaped you volante calamo; and that it is to be imputed, not so much to malice, to haughtiness, or even to your unacquaintedness with the people you traduce, as to the hurry and precipitation with which your treatise was apparently written.

Believe me to be, sir,

Most respectfully, yours.

LETTER LI.

To MR. —.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 29, 1774.

No congratulations wait on my ever dear friend from Broad-Hembury on account of his new connection. The reason is, because no change of state on his part can make me love and wish him better than I did before. Nor do I transmit you those compliments which usually reverberate from friend to friend at this particular season of the year: because you have my very best wishes, without intermission, all the year round. And so, I doubt not, will the new partner of your heart, when I have the honour and the pleasure of knowing her. In the meanwhile, I request you to inform her, that she has my respectful salutations.

I take the liberty to trouble you with the inclosed packet for Mr. M. It contains only the sermon on Psalm cxv. 1; which owes its transmission to the press entirely to your condescending desire, signified when I was last in London. You see I am not all disobedience to your commands; though I must, for once, run counter to some of them: I mean, so far as concerns the principal subject of your last kind and obliging letter. Some nephritic complaints, to which I have long perceived myself liable, warn me to ply my pen no more than necessity may require.

I am, with great affection and respect, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. I lost poor Mr. Lane about a fortnight ago: who, at the age of seventy-six, preserved all the strength and gaiety of a boy at sixteen, until within a few days of his decease. He was the second of my domestics whom God has removed by death in the compass of two months. Mrs. Lane (who, by the way, continues as lively at seventy-seven as she could be at thirty) still keeps my house; and supports the loss of her husband not only philosophically, but heroically. An estate, however, of twenty-five pounds per annum, which died with him, is, I believe, very sincerely, though not inconsolably, regretted. Mr. Lane had not been dead a quarter of an hour, when his relict addressed me thus: "Sir, I have been thinking that it will be to no purpose to lay out money for a fine shroud, to be hid in a coffin; nor for a fine coffin, to be hid under the earth." This was natural philosophy, literally so called. It is really a happiness, on irremediable occasions, to have little on no feeling. I envy insensible people, because they are ignorant of mental pain, the keenest species of any. Adieu

LETTER LII

TO THE REV. MR. RYLAND.

Broad Hembury, Dec. 29, 1774.

WHEN my dear friend's letter (whose date I am quite ashamed to recollect) arrived, our valuable Mrs. Macaulay was present. Her countenance brightened at learning from whom it came. She, on all occasions, testifies a singular esteem of you: which is in other words saying, that she really has you in very great estimation; for she is too magnanimous, and too upright, to dissemble. She gives your name as a favourite toast of yours and mine, in public and mixed companies. And she has, moreover, so high an opinion of your judgment in physic, no less than in metaphysic, that she makes it a constant rule, and did so during the whole of her three months, stay in Devonshire, to retire to her chamber at ten o'clock.

Though I love and respect you as much as that extraordinary lady can do, still I cannot say that I have carefully followed your advice relating to that early hour of repose with the same implicit obedience. We often regard the physician, and yet transgress his prescriptions. I am, however, reforming very fast in this particular. As a proof of which I must tell you, that if I prolong my studies at any time until two or three in the morning, I begin to think I am sitting up late. For the most part, I rarely exceed twelve or one.

Had the Northamptonshire living fallen to my lot, I should have been a very troublesome neighbour to you. Not a sixpenny pamphlet would I have sent to the press, without previously soliciting your corrections and amendments. You may be thankful that I am only your friend, and not your neighbour. Let me, in a religious view, seriously add that I myself am thankful, and very thankful, that I continue where I am. And I say this, not because I should not have preferred your county to this, but because it was the will of God, as the event has clearly proved, that I should remain in this county, and not be transplanted to yours.

Your thoughts concerning the "Directions to Young Divinity Students" are so just, so forcible, and so vivid, that I must absolutely lay aside all view of engaging in such a book myself. The department is eminently and exclusively yours. Let Homer, therefore, write his own Iliad. As to me, I feel my incompetence to so difficult and important a task, and must follow the old, sensible advice: Consule, quid valeant, &c.

My best thanks attend you for that valuable paper transmitted to me, some time ago, from Wells, under Mr. Tudway's enclosure; enumerating the passages in the Old Testament wherein Christ is styled Jehovah. You may judge how poorly qualified I am to accommodate young divines with rules for study, when I assure you that I did not know, until you informed me, that the blessed Mediator between God and man is called Jehovah almost two hundred times in the course of the first Testament.

If you wish your letters to Mr. S—— may arrive free of postage, you must enclose them to ——. Mr. S—— is one of the most learned, most devout, and most valuable men I know. With all his choir of respectable and of amiable qualities, he possesses this crowning one, viz., a heart, like yours, capable of friendship.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LIII.

TO AMBROSE SERLE, ESQ.

Broad Hembury, Jan. 25, 1775.

EVER DEAR SIR,

I WRITE to request that you will condescend to present Mr. M. with my thanks for his packet lately sent : and to inform him that, though I was by no means well when it arrived, yet the perusal of Mr. Wesley's "Thoughts upon Necessity" (which were part of the packet's contents) put my spirits into such a pleasing flow that I instantly resolved to attack those thoughts, and in half an hour afterwards actually set about it. I have, at three sittings (or rather standings, for I generally write upon my feet), got midway through my intended pamphlet; which will, if Providence please to continue health and leisure, be a Defence of Christian and Philosophic Necessity.

I design writing to Mr. M. myself, so soon as I have finished my tract: and thanking him for the kind conveyances with which he has favoured me. But, to say the truth, I am at present so absorbed in the subject on the tapis, that I am willing to pursue it while my ideas are warm; and warm ideas, if not speedily seized and arrested, are very fugitive.

Every happiness be to yours.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LIV.

To Mrs. MACAULAY.

Broad Hembury, Feb. 10, 1775.

DEAR MADAM,

YOUR favour of Jan. 27th arrived in due course. Had you deferred penning it but three days longer, it would have borne the date of a certain anniversary on which no person living is so well qualified to write as yourself.

I have had too much ill health this winter to be, as you suppose me to have been, very assiduously engaged "in deep researches after philosophical and religious truth." The principal result of my few researches in that way has been a tract (begun and finished within a fortnight) in explication and defence of Christian and philosophic necessity. But, I believe, I shall not commit it to the press until I go to London; the printers being a very teasing set of people to be concerned with at so great a distance from the scene of action.

As I know not how much longer my supposed researches may be impeded by want of health, I must beg that you will not, in time to come, forbear writing hither from an imaginary fear of "interrupting" researches which have little or no existence.

I will reduce you to a dilemma on the occasion. Either I am, or I am not, engaged in the said researches. If the former, then do you write by all means, and the oftener the better; for I know no pen more capable of assisting a philosophic enquirer than your own. If the latter, still write; for, in that case, the very reason under which you shelter yourself ceases to exist.

To tell you the truth, I am quite of opinion that, by your polite apology for being so bad a correspondent, you have only wedged yourself fast in a cleft stick, from which nothing can extricate you but your directing as many letters to Broad Hembury as possible.

I have not been at Honiton since I took leave of you there. But your host, Mr. N., I have seen twice; once at my own house, and once at Mr. Drewe's.

Many thanks to you, dear madam, for the purse which, you tell me, you have condescended to knit for me. I would rather, however, defer receiving it until I have the pleasure of seeing you at Bath; which I hope will be within these two months; either in my way to, or in my return from, London.

I have a very extraordinary letter to show you; sent me by my respectable friend, Dr. Baker, vicar of St. Martin's, in Salisbury, relative to Bradshaw's interment in Jamaica. I own I am partly staggered, though not proselyted, as to that matter. I set it down under the class of "Historic Doubts."

But, without any shadow of doubt at all I have the honour to be,

Madam,

Your much obliged and very obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. Compliments to Miss Macaulay. I observe you do not say a syllable concerning our common favourite, Mr. Lytton. On second thoughts, I will not (as I at first designed) defer shewing you Dr. B.'s letter until we meet, but shall enclose it in this. The circumstance of double postage is not to be considered. Adieu.

LETTER LV.

To Mr. L. C.

Broad Hembury, Feb. 13, 1775.

[Extract]

It is Dr. Samuel Johnson whom Lord Chesterfield terms "a respectable Hottentot;" and whom his lordship, by a caricature abundantly too severe and overcharged, represents as the living essence of awkwardness and ill-breeding. I can testify, upon my own knowledge, that the shades are too deepened, and the line, too distorted. But the doctor is pretty even, it seems, with the noble defamer; and styles those letters, "A system of morals for a whore, and a system of manners for a dancing-master." I totally agree with the doctor as to the morals, and partly agree with him as to the manners. Seriously, poor Mr. Phil. Stanhope was greatly to be pitied for falling under the management of such a father: a father who was at once capable of guiding a son into the ruinous paths of vice, and of pretending, at other times, to give him a few squeamish cautions against it. Like some hypocritical prostitute who entices with an air of affected modesty, and assumes that air of modesty only to render her enticements the more effectual. Moreover, after all his lordship's attention to the "graces" of his disciple, the poor young gentleman lived and died almost as great a stranger to the graces of politeness as to those of the Holy Spirit. So that the disappointed father had the mortification of perceiving that he had only been raining upon a rock. Few men of education and high connection were ever more clumsy and ungainly in their devoir than Mr. Stanhope.

I take the true original of Lord Chesterfield's disgust against Dr. J—— to have been, the doctor's having too much Christianity for his Lordship's taste. Not but what Johnson has, on some occasions, a great deal of positiveness about him: and Lord C—— was so much of the fine gentleman as to think that nothing, either in religion or philosophy, was worth contending for, in opposition to whatever genteel company a person might happen to be with. It would be committing an act of hostility "on the graces," were a man not to swim implicitly with the current, whether good or bad. Johnson, I believe, was never guilty, so much as once in his life, of such mean, cowardly dissimulation. And I honour him for it. If he likes his company, no man is more affable and communicative. If he meets with a coxcomb, he is sure of taking him down without mercy. Or, if people of sense affront him, he discovers very great and quick sensibility, and generally makes them pay dear for their temerity; for his reproofs are weighty with sentiment, and his repartees cuttingly smart. It must have been pleasant to have seen him and Lord Chesterfield together.

The smooth dissimulation of the latter extended, in some measure, even to me. The year after I was in orders (viz., 1763), I asked his lordship for a scarf. "I am extremely sorry, sir," replied he, "that you did not mention it early enough. Had you asked me two days sooner, a scarf should have been at your service: but no longer ago than yesterday I gave away my only vacant one." I answered that I should be glad to hope for the honour of the next that fell. He replied, "The very next is already promised: but you shall certainly have the next after that." You can discern, without my pointing it out, the flat self-contradiction of these two plausible speeches.—I never asked him again: but looked upon him as a finished courtier from that day forward. When I was a boy, he used to give me a guinea now and then: and generally pre-faced his donation (which to me was then a capital sum) with some such proper advice as this: "Now, do not buy too many apples, or nuts, or oranges, to make yourself sick." He certainly had a great fund of good nature at bottom, though it was half smothered and corrupted by art and finesse.

Have you read Mrs. Macaulay's Address to the People? I am greatly pleased with the strength of sense which appears in that concise but solid performance. Alas, too solid! Would to God that the facts which it censures were ill founded. But his providence governs and orders all. No thanks to them that they are involuntarily and unknowingly accomplishing the decree of heaven. "Leeches," as a good man somewhere observes, "when they draw blood of a patient, do it to gratify themselves: they know nothing of the wise end for which the physician ordered them to be applied."

The mention of my valuable friend Mrs. Macaulay reminds me of the aforesaid Dr. Johnson, whose high principles, both political and ecclesiastical, are very different from those of the fair historian. A few years ago, Mrs. M. and the doctor (who never had a very cordial esteem for each other) met at the house of a third person, who had invited them to spend the day. Before dinner the conversation turned on the nature of civil government. Johnson, as usual, declared, in very strong terms, for monarchy, Mrs. M. for a republic. Some sparring passed on both sides: and Johnson, happening to cite some passage of Scripture, which he thought spoke in favour of his own system, Mrs. M. undertook him on the Scriptural score, and (as I was told, for I was not present) was rather more potent and pertinent in her quotations than he. Johnson, who does not easily digest contradiction, grew rather sour, and he well knows that he acquires himself better in a political, a historic, or a philosophic war, than in a holy one. The announcement of dinner occasioned a truce to debate. But the doctor, with more ill manners than I ever heard authentically placed to his account, except in this instance, took occasion, when the company were all seated at table, to renew hostilities with his amiable antagonist. Mrs. M.'s footman was standing, according to custom, at the back of his lady's chair; when Johnson addressed him thus; "Henry, what makes you stand? Sit down, sit down. Take your place at table with the best of us. We are all republicans, Henry. There is no distinction here. The rights of human nature are equal. Your mistress will not be angry at your asserting your privilege of peerage. We are all on a level. Do take your chair and sit down." This was very indelicate and rude. Nor was it arguing fairly: for a master or mistress (let the natural rights of mankind be, originally, ever so equal) has not only a just claim to superiority, but a title to the services of every person who, by voluntary stipulation, engages to render those services for a consideration agreed upon. Mrs. Macaulay, it seems, coloured a little, and drew up her head, but made no answer. If I had been there I should not have let the doctor off so easily for this savage piece of spurious wit. It is true, his great parts are entitled to proper respect: but, as Mrs. Macaulay was observing to me when she was last in Devonshire, with reference to this very doctor Johnson, "A learned man is not so miraculous a phenomenon in this kingdom that he should expect to be honoured with divine worship." Though, it must be owned, there are very few Johnsons in any kingdom, or in any age.

It is, however, this great man's foible to look for more homage and attention than every body will give him. How little he brooks opposition may be inferred from the droll (but which might have been a very serious) adventure between him and Osborne, the Lincoln's-Inn bookseller. Osborne called upon him one morning, soon after the publication of his Dictionary. The particulars of the conversation I have forgot: but in the course of it, some reference was had to a passage in that work. The doctor was for consulting the particular place itself; and, ascending a set of moveable steps, reached down his Dictionary from one of the highest shelves. While Johnson was thus mounted, and holding the Dictionary in his hands, Osborne, who was standing beneath, happened to say some saucy thing that the doctor did not relish: on which, without further ceremony, he hurled the massy folio at the poor bookseller's head, who fell to the floor with the blow, but soon recovered his feet again. "An impertinent puppy," said Johnson to him, "I will teach you to behave with insolence to me; I will." But surely this was not acting very philosophically.

One more anecdote, while my hand is in, and then I will release you. I knew this Osborne, and, by the way, a very respectable man he was. In the spring of 1762, a month or two before I took deacon's orders, I was cheapening some books of him. After that business was over, he took me to the farthest end of his long shop, and, in a low voice, said thus: "Sir, you will soon be ordained. I suppose you have not laid in a very great stock of sermons. I can supply you with as many sets as you please. All originals, very excellent ones, and they will come for a trifle." My answer was, "I certainly shall never be a customer to you in that way: for I am of opinion that the man who cannot or will not make his own sermons is quite unfit to wear the gown. How could you think of my buying ready-made sermons? I would much sooner, if I must do one or the other, buy ready-made clothes." His answer shocked me: "Nay, young gentleman, do not be surprised at my offering you ready-made sermons; for, I assure you, I have sold ready-made sermons to many a bishop in my time." My reply was: "Good Mr. Osborne, if you have any concern for the credit of the Church of England, never tell that news to any body else, henceforward, for ever."

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LVI.

TO FRANCIS TOPLADY, ESQ

Broad Hembury, March 19, 1775

VERY DEAR SIR,

You are one of the last persons on earth in whose breast I would wish to occasion pain. Consequently it gives me much concern to find, from your favour of Feb. 21, that the subject mentioned in my last "touched you to the quick." Let it resemble a drawn stake on each side; and let both of us consider the matter as if it had never been started.

Your kind solicitude for my health merits my affectionate acknowledgments. Though I cannot entirely agree with you in supposing that intense study has been the cause of my late indispositions; I must yet confess that the hill of science, like that of virtue, is in some instances climbed with labour. But when we get a little way up the lovely prospects which open to the eye make infinite amends for the steepness of the ascent. In short, I am wedded to those pursuits as a man stipulates to take his wife: viz., for better, for worse, until death us do part. My thirst for knowledge is literally inextinguishable. And if I thus drink myself into a superior world I cannot help it; but must say, as some report Aristotle to have said, when he threw himself into the sea (if it be true that he did so throw himself), quod non capere possum me capiet.

Since I wrote to you last, my complaints have been crowned, or rather shod, with a short, but smart touch of the gout. On this occasion I have been congratulated until I have lost all patience. Therefore I do by these presents enter an express caveat against your wishing me joy. I am glad, however, that I know at last what is the matter with me: for I have not been right well these two years; and was unable, until seized by the foot, to ascertain the radical cause. It is really one of the last disorders to which I should have suspected myself liable. If the strictest temperance could have saved me from the gout, I most certainly had been exempted: for I never knew what it was to be the reverse of sober so much as once in my whole life. On a review, I am quite ashamed to perceive that I have made myself the sole hero of my letter. But, notwithstanding the self-important pronoun I has already occurred too often, I must yet repeat it again; by assuring you that I am, with tender and respectful compliments to yourself, to my aunt, and to my cousin Charlotte,

Dear sir, your affectionate nephew,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LVII.

TO THE REV. MR. —.

Broad Hembury, April 5, 1775.

VERY DEAR SIR,

I AM, both literally and figuratively, your debtor, for the welcome packet with which you favoured me toward the close of last January.

Friendship and politeness less indulgent and extensive than your own would tell me that I ought to blush for having delayed my acknowledgments so long. The truth is, I had been extremely ill for several weeks before the parcel arrived; and continued so for some weeks afterwards: which, added to the numerous avocations that have since demanded my attention, obliged me to postpone, until now, the pleasure of tendering my affectionate thanks to your condescending acceptance.

I have not been able to devote many hours to the perusal of Dilly's astrology. But I must frankly own that I have read enough to deter me from falling very deeply in love with that real or supposed science. Judge, my dear sir, how exalted an idea I must needs entertain of your candour, ere I could presume to testify, in such blunt terms as these, my opinion of a study which, in the eyes of your superior estimation, appears to be recommended by so many solid and alluring charms.

Among others, two observations in particular strike me with great force on this occasion.

1. Either we can, or we cannot, learn from the stars the train of future events. If we cannot, the whole business evaporates at once into a laborious delusion, and an ingenious nothing. If we can, it seems unwarrantable to pry into "the times and seasons which the Father hath put in his own power," and which the highest authority assures us "are not for us to know." The least that can be said is that it is more humble, and more safe, to leave the evolution of futurity to Providence; to pray instead of erecting a planetary figure: and, instead of consulting the stars, to cast all our care on him that made them.

2. Without doubt, many different infants are born into the world at the same precise point of time; and consequently under the self-same aspects of the heavenly orbs. From which leading circumstance it would follow, on astrological principles, that the cast of mind, the actions, the felicities, the adversities, and, in short, the whole lives and deaths of persons so born, should exactly, in every punctilio, resemble those of each other. Their natiivities being common, their fates would be the same. But are there any two men upon the stage of the earth, though they entered it at the same instant, whose minds and fates are perfectly similar and uniformly correspondent throughout?

Notwithstanding these free sceptical remarks, I value Lilly's Book as a very curious one: and shall, with many thanks, reimburse my dear friend for its cost.

Though you have not set me to work as an astrologer, you have as a polemic, Mr. Wesley's Thoughts on Necessity, which made a part of your obliging packet, determined me to represent that grand theological and philosophic article in its true point of view. Though I was then so ill that I could scarcely hold my pen, Providence enabled me to begin my Essay almost immediately on my receiving Mr. John's Tract, and to finish it within a fortnight. I should not, however, have made such haste, had I not apprehended that, if I did not avail myself of the present hour, I might probably be in another world before my treatise was completed. But God has extended my reprieve; may I live, and speak, and act, to his glory!

May I congratulate you on your success as candidate for the lectureship of St. * * * * *? If not, I shall still wish you joy. You and all your concerns are in the hand of him whose will is wisdom, whose heart is love, and whose providence is omnipotence itself.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LVIII.

TO THE REV. DR. GIFFORD.

Broad Hembury, April 6, 1775.

DEAR AND REV. SIR,

IN obedience to your wish, I shall concisely present you with my extemporaneous thoughts concerning the Arminian cavil against personal election and reprobation, drawn from that relationship of God to men by which he is denominated and considered as the father of the whole human race.

Properly speaking, paternity and filiation are correlatives, resulting from the production of a similar intelligent being, ex essentiali productoris. Where this agency and effect obtain, the producer is strictly styled a father, and the produced is strictly styled the offspring of that father.

Consequently, when any of mankind, or when all of them together, are termed sons, or children of God, the phrase is, necessarily and apparently, figurative. For no being less divine than God himself can, according to the precise ideas of paternity and filiation, be literally termed his Son.

Hence, when this predicate, sons of God, is affirmed, concerning angels or men; the affirmation neither is, nor can be, philosophically strict. Because there is no communicated sameness of essence from the producing party to the party produced.

Over and above which metaphysical observation, holy Scripture explicitly ascertains the sense in which God is represented as the Father of men. Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?

Mr. Toulmin therefore, in his controversy with Mr. Rooker (a controversy, by the way, whose merits I have not looked into), should have stated his objection thus: "Can the common Maker of mankind put an arbitrary difference between the men he has made, consistently with infinite goodness and justice?"

However, we will let Mr. Toulmin have his own way, and clothe his argument in his own terms.

He observes,

1. That "Our Lord has taught us to argue from the paternal character" of God.—True. And that paternal character is neither less nor more than the creative character. The passage, Matt. vii. 11. to which Mr. Toulmin refers, plainly establishes this remark: for it is tantamount to saying, How much more shall your Maker, who is in heaven, &c. [Let me digress, en passant, by observing that, in the 21st verse of the above chapter, Christ uses the word Father in its true and absolute signification. For the first person in the Godhead is, properly, literally, and physically, the Father and the immediate source of the second per communicationem essentialia.]

2. Mr. T. asks Mr. R. "Would you, sir, who are a parent, secretly resolve, before your children were born, and could have done either good or evil, to disinherit any of your children?"

On which I observe,

(1.) That Mr. Rooker may, in his turn, ask Mr. Toulmin, And would you, sir, after your children are born, actually permit any of them to be very wicked and very miserable, if it was in your power, by a single nod of your will, to make them good and to render them happy? Now God certainly is able to endue all mankind, and the very devils themselves, with holiness and felicity. He could both have saved them from falling, and can still reclaim them though fallen. And yet he, knowingly and willingly, permits many of the former, and the whole number of the latter, to be the subjects of sin and pain. And if the real, positive, continued permission of this be not inconsistent with the "paternal character;" why should that "character" be supposed to restrain God from secretly resolving, beforehand, on that permission? For, surely, the resolution to do or to permit a thing can no more clash with the "paternal character," than the actual doing or the actual permitting of the thing itself.—But, after all,

(2.) God and an earthly parent are not parallels in any one respect whatever. When a human father becomes possessed of the same numerical nature and attributes as God is, in all their infinity and perfection, it will then (but until then it cannot) be an admissible position, that the Deity is and must be such as one as ourselves, and ought to regulate his conduct by the example we set him. I remember, in the year 1759, while I was a student at college, a gentleman asked me (with reference to this very doctrine which Mr. T. opposes), Would you, if you were God, create any being to misery? My answer was, When I am God I will tell you. Surely, Arminians must be at a dismal loss, ere they could thus think of setting up the human passions, and parental affection in particular (which is, usually, the blindest affection of any), as the standard, and model, and archetype, from which God himself must form his estimate of right and wrong, and in conformity to which he is bound (for the plea supposes this if it supposes anything) to accommodate his purposes and shape his moral conduct! As if his ways were not higher than our ways, and his thoughts than our thoughts!

(3.) The cavil is very unhappily stated. For the most material part of it is phrased in the very words of Scripture. With this essential difference, however, that the said Scripture phrases positively affirm the identical proposition which the cavil is framed to deny. So directly and totally contrary is the judgment of Mr. T. to that of St. Paul.

(4.) It is monstrously inaccurate to insinuate that God has "secretly resolved to disinherit some of his children." We utterly reject the very shadow of such an idea, as involving in it both a religious and a philosophical impossibility. To disinherit is to cut off from succession to a patrimony or other property, one who before was actual heir. Men may do this: because men are liable to change, and to mistake, and to be chagrined or disgusted by unforeseen incidents. But this can never be the case with God. Consequently, he cannot be said to disinherit the reprobate, who never were heirs. And, for the elect, he will never disinherit them: seeing, nothing shall be able to separate them from that unchangeable love, which hath graciously made them heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ himself.

(5.) I suppose Mr. Toulmin meant to ask: "Would God resolve not to invest some of his creatures with a title to the heavenly inheritance?" To which I answer, Yes. God not only justly might, but he actually has so resolved: unless the Bible is false from end to end. But as to disinheriting, the Bible knows nothing of that. It is Arminianism which represents the immutable God as the capricious disinheritor of his children; not we, who believe that whom he did predestinate, them he also glorified.

(6.) To make the objection square with the thing objected to, the objection should run thus: "Would you, Mr. Rooker, who are a creator, secretly resolve, before your creatures were formed, to exclude any of them from felicity, for wise and just reasons best known to yourself?" — But this phraseology, which alone comes up to the point in debate, would not suit Mr. Toulmin's fallacious views. It would not suffice to raise a sophistical mist before the eyes of the unwary, which are apt to be caught by superficial appearances, and to be dazzled by the trappings of undue metaphor artfully put on. To make a straight stick seem crooked, you must look at it through a denser medium than air: i. e. hold it slantingly under water, and the business is done. Unguarded spectators may be seduced by the stratagem; but careful observers perceive the trick.

In one word: the question, as stated and phrased by Mr. Toulmin, argues à diverso ad diversum: and consequently is totally illogical, and proves nothing.

I am, with great esteem, &c.,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER LIX.

TO MESSRS. VALLANCE AND SIMMONS.

Plymouth, July 7, 1775.

GENTLEMEN,

I AM here on a short visit previously to my setting out for Bath and London: and now write to you, on occasion of a report which prevails here, that Mr. J. W— died lately in Ireland.

You, who dwell at the mart of intelligence, know, probably, the real state of that matter with more certainty than I can yet attain to at this distance. But, should my information be true, I must signify to you my hearty wishes that my Essay on Necessity, if not yet actually published, may be suppressed for the present: until I can throw it into a new form, by cancelling all the passages which have any personal reference to my old antagonist: and by retaining only so much of the Treatise as relates to the naked argument itself.

I hope this intimation will reach you time enough to answer the desired purpose. If it be too late, I cannot help it. But I do not wish to prosecute my war with that gentleman, if he be really summoned to the tribunal of God, and unable on earth to answer for himself. In that case, let my remembrance of his misdemeanors die and be buried with him.

Direct your answer, to me, at Mr. D——'s in G—— street, Bath. I have only time to add that I am, with esteem,

Gentlemen, yours, &c.,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER LX

TO LADY HUNTINGDON.

Brighthelmstone, Sept. 22, 1775.

MADAM,

BEST thank to your dear ladyship for the honour of your much esteemed letter from Bristol, of the 8th instant. You were so ill when I left you there, that the receipt of a letter which carries in it the evident traits of your recovery was peculiarly welcome, and furnished me with additional matter of thanksgiving to that God who, in mercy to his church, has been graciously pleased to protract a life so transcendently useful and valuable. It would be far better for your ladyship to be dissolved and to be with Christ: but it is more needful for his people below that you remain in the body. On their account, may it be very long ere you exchange your coronet for a crown.

It would have given me much joy to have been present on a late happy occasion, at Bristol: our friends Mr. and Mrs. ———, when they had the honour of waiting on your ladyship there, presented my message, I suppose, and assigned the reason; I bless the Father of mercies, that the power of the Spirit was experienced, and that he continues to speed your gospel plough.

I have been at this place a week to-day; and mean, if the Lord please, to overstay the 1st Sunday in October: here is a very considerable gathering of people to the standard of the cross. I have found much union with them, and the unction of the Holy One has given me much comfort and enlargement among them hitherto, in our public approaches to God. By a letter from dear Mr. P——, who is now at Chichester, I find that a new chapel at Petworth, and another at Guildford, are to be opened the 1st of October. May they receive that true consecration which arises from the presence and power of the Great Shepherd and Bishop of souls. I trust God will enable me and the people here, who are now of the most clearly enlightened, most judicious, most harmoniously united, and most lively congregations I ever was with, to pour out our souls in prayer on that day, for a blessing on your ladyship's labour of love in general, and on those two new encampments in particular.

I am informed, that Lady M——'s zeal for God has been considerably blest to many of her neighbours at or near Ealing. She has frequent preaching in her house; and it seems there is good hope that Lord R—— himself begins to have the hearing ear, and the feeling heart.

Has your ladyship seen the corrected copy of dear Mr. R——'s Treatise on Psalmody? If you have, you must have perceived that the very exceptionable passages, which laid that great and good man open to such just reprehension, are happily expunged. I asked him for a copy, soon after my arrival in London. He answered, that in its present state, he did not acknowledge it for his: but, I should have one as soon as published. He was as good as his word, and shortly after gave me his book. I examined it very carefully; and find that the faulty pages have been cancelled. We now no longer read of Watts's Hymns being Watts's whims, nor of the Holy Spirit's being always present where psalms are sung, and never present where hymns are sung. I am glad that my valuable friend was under a necessity of striking out these and such like violent and unguarded positions. I never met with so much as one spiritual person who did not censure them most severely; but as he has been so humble and so just to truth as to displace them from his Essay, I hope he will meet with no farther slight and mortification on their account.

God go with your ladyship into Cornwall, and shine on all your efforts for the glory of his name, and for the transfusion of his salvation into the hearts of sinners. Open your trenches, and ply the gospel artillery. And may it prove mighty, through God, to the demolition of every thought and every error, and every work, which exalts itself against the knowledge, the love, and the obedience of Christ!

Your affectionate servant in him,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER LXI.

To Mr. L——.

Brighthelmstone, Sept. 25, 1775.

DEAR SIR,

PERMIT me to condole with you and with dear Mrs. —— on the loss of our valuable and valued friend, Mrs. ——, the oldest, and one of the most esteemed acquaintance I had on earth. I rejoice, however, that through the precious blood and the imputed righteousness of Christ she is exalted to that place of glory and of rest where the inhabitants shall no more say, I am sick.

Let me give you the true apology for my having no sooner acknowledged the receipt of your obliging letter, which you will not wonder at, when I inform you that I was five or six weeks in travelling from Broad Hembury to London, occasioned by the many interjacent friends I had to visit; and by their condescending importunities, which detained me much longer with each of them than I expected or designed.

On my arrival in town, I found your letter, and would have answered it while there, but for the multiplicity of engagements in which the affection of my London friends involved me. I had not been long in the capital, when I received a pressing invitation to this place, where I have stayed near a fortnight, and whence I return to London next week.

May the late affecting breach which Providence has made in your domestic connections be sanctified to you both, and excite you to seek an interest in that Saviour who is the certain and only deliverer of his people from the wrath to come.

In him I remain, dear sir, your and Mrs. ——'s very sincere friend and servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

---

LETTER LXII.

To Mr. N——.

Brighthelmstone, Sept. 26, 1775.

IF you should ever stand in peculiar need of very violent exercise, come down hither, by way of Ryegate and Cuckfield; and before the present stage coach is worn out. The road from the former of these towns to this is the roughest, the country the coarsest, and the vehicle the uneasiest that can well be imagined. I never yet had so complete a shaking: and, though much used to travelling, was literally sore from head to foot for twenty-four hours after my arrival here, occasioned by such a series of concussions (I had almost said contusions), as I really thought it impossible for any carriage to impart. But I have had ample amends, at my journey's end. For though, in my opinion, our western sea-ports have generally many local charms greatly superior to those of this; yet the inhabitants here seem to have received a much higher polish from their intercourse with strangers. But, above all, the serious people of Brighthelmstone are, so far as I can hitherto judge, peculiarly amiable and estimable; extremely judicious, and well informed in the things of God; and all alive to him. In short, I know of no congregation any where who seem to be more entirely after my own heart. Their union, likewise, and fellowship with each other, are uncommon, considering their number. The great master of our assemblies, God the Holy Spirit, has given us some comfortable opportunities in public; and deigned, I trust, several times, to be eminently present. To free and covenant grace be all the praise.

I am as well as I usually find myself when plunged in a sea air. The salts, I apprehend, with which these kind of atmospheres are charged, together with the large quantity of vapour, exhaled by so great an expanse of water, by considerably increasing the weight of the element we breathe, make it at once more externally compressive, and require a stronger force of interior effort and resistance, to respire with due vigour.

Last Wednesday we were saluted by a continued series of lightning, from eight at night until one in the morning. Not a moment's interval obtained between the flashes; which formed absolute sheets of the most vivid flame, succeeding each other with a rapidity I never was witness to before. As it played on the sea (for I spent the evening at a gentleman's who lives on the East Cliff) it resembled a grand, regular cascade of fire, falling on a vast reflecting mirror. There was rain during a small part of the time; and some audible thunder. I have heard louder claps; but never such long extended peals. How happy is it to feel that the God of nature is also God of all!

I am,

Your affectionate servant in him,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXIII.

TO DR. WILLIAM DODD.

New-street, March 17, 1777.

REV. SIR,

BELIEVE me when I assure you that the liberty which I now take results neither from want of tenderness nor of respect; but from a humble wish of being serviceable to a person who is recommended to me as a very deserving individual, and whose circumstances are, it seems, considerably narrowed and embarrassed, through the unsuspecting confidence which she reposed on your veracity, justice, and honour.

The lady to whom I allude is Mrs. G——. I need not state the merits of a case with which you, sir, are so thoroughly acquainted. Only permit me to conjure you, by every sacred and moral consideration, and by all your feelings as a man of sensibility, not to depart this world without repaying as much of that iniquitous debt as you possibly can.

I say, before you depart this world For it is but too indubitable that there is not a single ray of hope from any one quarter whatsoever, of your avoiding the utmost effect of the terrible sentence which impends. Let me, therefore, impertune you, for God's sake and for your own, to devote the remainder of your time to more important employ than that of writing notes on Shakspeare. Indeed, and indeed, your situation is such as should confine your attention to objects of infinitely greater moment. The Searcher of hearts knows that I thus plainly address you from motives of absolute humanity, and from an anxious solicitude for your everlasting welfare.

I am,

With undissembled sympathy and respect,

Sir,

Your well-wisher in time, and eternity,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

You will oblige me, sir, if you favour me with a line (by the gentleman who delivers this to your hands) relative to the business respecting Mrs. G——

LETTER LXIV.

TO THE REV. MR. BERRIDGE.

New-street, March 19, 1776.

DEAR SIR,

THE paper to which you refer in your favour of to-day, is, I apprehend, the Public Ledger of the 5th instant. As you inform me that you have not seen it, I inclose it to you, for your perusal, under the present cover: together with a subsequent Ledger of the 9th, containing my answer. When you have read them, I request you to return them, so soon as convenient: for I reserve every thing of this kind, lest it may prove necessary to appeal to them in future.

If I was not certain that the glorious and gracious Head of the Church orders all things for the good of his mystic body, and that not a hair can fall without his leave; I should deeply lament the continuance of your cough. But, when I recollect who it is that sits at the helm, I can, in a spirit of prayer and of faith, commit you and all that relates to you to the unerring disposal of infinite wisdom, love, and power. In whose covenant-bonds I remain,

Dear and Rev. Sir, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXV.

To Mr. T——.

London, April 4, 1776.

SIR,

It gives me unspeakable pleasure to find that you design to republish the Abridgment of Fox's Martyrology; which I consider as a faithful and judicious compendium of the most valuable ecclesiastical history extant in our language.

We live at a time when the generality of professed Protestants appear to have lost sight of those grand and essential principles to which the Church of England was reformed, and in defence of which her martyrs bled.

Religious ignorance, and a general unconcernedness about divine things, together with the most profuse dissipation, and a growing disregard of moral virtue, are the reigning characteristics of the present age.

In a country thus circumstanced, Popery (ever on the watch for advantages) will, and must, and does, gain continual ground. Ignorance, infidelity, and licentiousness, naturally terminate in superstition, as their ultimate refuge: and Rome too often reaps what profaneness and immorality have sown.

To stem so dangerous a torrent no means are more likely (under God) than the republication of such a work as this: a work eminently calculated to display and to guard us against the principles and the spirit of Popery; to perpetuate the holy lives, the faithful testimonies, and the triumphant deaths, of those evangelical worthies who resisted error, even unto blood: to exalt the standard of Christ: to exhibit the loving-kindness of the Holy Ghost, who gave such grace and power unto men, and to stand as the best commentary on those inestimable truths, which (through the good hand of God upon us) still continue to shine in the liturgy, articles, and homilies, of our Established Church.

I wish this performance much success, in the name of the Lord. May its diffusion be very extensive, and its usefulness very great. May it prove mighty, through God, to make the Protestant Churches in general, and our own national Church in particular, remember whence they are fallen; stir them up to doctrinal and practical repentance, and bring them back to their first principles, and to their first works! With this prayer, breathed from the inmost of my heart,

I remain, Sir,

Your affectionate well-wisher,

AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE TOPLADY.

LETTER LXVI.

To Mr. HUSSEY

Broad Hembury, Sept. 9, 1776.

VERY DEAR SIR,

A STUDENT of Lady Huntingdon's, whose name is Cottingham, and from whom I parted at Bristol on my return from Wales, promised me to wait on you and Mrs. Hussey in London, to inform you how gracious the Lord has been to me ever since I saw you last.

The night I left town, the Worcester coach in which I went, broke down: but not one of us received the least injury. I have a still greater deliverance to acquaint you with; even such, as I trust, will never be blotted from my thankful remembrance. On the Anniversary Day in Wales, the congregation was so large that the chapel would not have contained a fourth part of the people, who were supposed to amount to three thousand. No fewer than one thousand three hundred horses were turned into one large field adjoining the College; besides what were stationed in the neighbouring villages. The carriages, also, were unusually numerous. A scaffold was erected at one end of the College-court, on which a bookstand was placed, by way of pulpit: and thence six or seven of us preached, successively, to one of the most attentive and most lively congregations I ever beheld. When it came to my turn to preach, I advanced to the front; and had not gone more than half through my prayer before sermon, when the scaffold suddenly fell in. As I stood very near the highermost step (and the steps did not fall with the rest), Providence enabled me to keep on my feet, through the assistance of Mr. Winkworth, who laid fast hold on my arm. About forty ministers were on the scaffold and steps when the former broke down. Dear Mr. Shirley fell undermost of all, but received no other hurt than a very slight bruise on one of his thighs. A good woman, who, for the conveniency of hearing, had placed herself under the scaffold, received a trifling contusion on her face. No other mischief was done. The congregation, though greatly alarmed, had the prudence not to throw themselves into outward disorder: which, I believe, was chiefly owing to the powerful sense of God's presence, which was eminently felt by most of the assembly.

Such was the wonderful goodness of the Lord to me, that I was not in the least disconcerted on this dangerous occasion: which I mention to the praise of that grace and providence without which a much smaller incident would inevitably have shocked every nerve I have. About half a minute after the interruption had commenced, I had the satisfaction to inform the people that no damage had ensued: and removing for security to a lower step, I thanked the Lord, with the rejoicing multitude, for having so undeniably given his angels charge concerning us. Prayer ended, I was enabled to preach: and great grace seemed to be upon us all.

If God permit, I hope to be with you, in London, soon after the middle of this month. I deem it one of the principal felicities of my life, that I have the happiness and the honour to minister to a praying people. We should not have had so much of the Lord's presence in Orange-street if he had not poured upon us the spirit of supplication. Go on to pray, and God will go on to bless. Remember me most respectfully and most tenderly to as many of our dear friends in Christ as you are acquainted with. And particularly inform Mr. and Mrs. Willett, and Mr. and Mrs. Stokes, that I have not forgot my promise to write to them; and that I will perform my promise, unless they are so kind as to dispense with it: which I am very sure they would most willingly do if they knew how little time I have to myself.

Farewell. Grace be with you, and with dear Mrs. Hussey. Grace comprehends all we want, in time, and in eternity.

I remain,

My valuable friend, ever, ever yours,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. I had the happiness to see dear Lady Huntingdon (who is the most precious saint of God I ever knew) well, both in body and soul.

The Lord, I trust, still continues with you at Orange-Chapel. I shall be much obliged to you for informing me how things go on, by a line directed to me, at Mr. Derham's, in Green Street, Bath: for which place I intend to set out, from Devonshire, on Monday next, the 16th instant.

I have the unutterable satisfaction to find several more awakened people at Broad Hembury than I formerly knew of. The Lord never sends his gospel to any place in vain. He will call in his own people; and will accomplish his own work. There is really a very precious remnant in and about this parish. Thanks to free grace for all.

LETTER LXVII.

To Mr. _____.

MUCH LAMENTED SIR,

IN consequence of your desire, communicated to me by Mr. _____, I signified my intention of waiting on you: but, on reflection, I more than fear that I have not sufficient firmness of nerves to sustain so trying an interview. My feelings are (unhappily for myself) so terribly keen, that I should only receive material injury, without being able to render you the least good: My tears can be of no service to you. My prayers are frequently ascending to God for you, both in public and in private. May the uncreated angel of the covenant take them, warm as they rise from my unworthy heart and lips; and make them his own, by presenting them with the much incense of his ever effectual intercession.

If I am rightly informed, you have formerly sat under the sound of the gospel. Let me beseech you, sir, to cry mightily to him who is able to save, that the Holy Ghost may realize to your departing soul those precious truths of grace which have, it seems, been often brought to your ears. Nothing short of experimental religion will stand you in any stead. The Lord Jesus enable you, by the operation of his spirit, to come to him as a lost sinner; throwing yourself on the righteousness of his life, and on the atonement of his death, for your free pardon and full justification with God! In which case, though your transgressions be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; and, though deep as crimson, they shall be made as wool.

I have too much reason to apprehend that all application in your behalf to the powers of this world will be totally without avail. Consider yourself, therefore, dear sir, as absolutely a dying man.

My earnest supplications shall not cease to be poured out at the footstool of the throne of grace, until death sets you beyond the reach of prayer. Several congregations of God's people bear you deeply on their hearts.

Jesus bless you with the manifestations of his favour; and grant you to sing his praises, for ever and ever, in concert with that innumerable assembly of fallen sinners, whom he has loved, and wash from their sins in his own blood. So prays, with bended knees and weeping eyes, he who is, sir,

Your unknown,

but not less affectionate well-wisher,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXVIII.

To A. B.———.

Knightsbridge, Aug. 12, 1777.

If A. B.'s favour of June 16 had not been mislaid, it would have been answered long before. I hope the polite and ingenious writer will pardon the delay

In reply to the question stated, I am most deeply and clearly convinced that the saints in glory know each other: and more particularly those with whom they took sweet counsel when on earth, and with whom they walked in the house of God as friends. Our Lord himself, I apprehend, gives us to understand as much, where he tells us that the elect shall be, in the future state, ισαγγελοι, or equal to the angels. Now it seems impossible that the unfallen angels who have lived together in heaven for (at least) very near 6000 years, should not be perfectly acquainted with each other. And the same privilege is requisite in order to our being, in every respect, on an equality with them.—The departed soul of the rich man knew Lazarus, when he beheld him afar off: and likewise, at sight, knew Abraham, whom he could never have seen in the present life. Much more do Abraham and Lazarus, and all the glorified family above, rejoice in that communion of saints which obtains in their Father's house. St. Paul, speaking of the spiritual children whom God had given him among the Thessalonians, says, that they would be his "glory and crown of rejoicing, in the day of the Lord Jesus." But how could this be, and how could they mutually congratulate each other on the grace bestowed upon them below if all personal acquaintance was to cease? Surely there are no strangers in that land of light and love!

The three apostles who attended our blessed Lord on the mount of Transfiguration, knew Moses and Elijah when they appeared in glory. To add no more: that remarkable text, I think, fully establishes the point, where our adorable Saviour bids us make to ourselves friends, by the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when we fail, they may receive us into the everlasting habitations. As if he had said: "While you are on earth, take care to conciliate the affections of my indigent disciples, by bestowing on them a proper portion of the wealth which God has lent you, and which is too often perverted to purposes of unrighteousness by them that know not me. So, when your bodies die, and when your souls ascend to heaven, the souls of those poor afflicted saints whom your bounty relieved below, and who were got to glory before you, shall be among the first exulting spirits, who shall meet you on your arrival above, and congratulate you on your safe and triumphant entrance into the world of joy." But they could not do this unless they knew us, and we them.

May the precious blood and righteousness of our Incarnate God, and the faithful leadings of his eternal Spirit, bring you and me to that general assembly and church of the first-born! where we shall both see him as he is; and likewise know each other, even as we shall then be known. With this prayer and in this hope I beg leave to subscribe myself, whosoever you may be,

Your affectionate well-wisher in Christ,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXIX.

To THE REV DR. B. of Sarum.

Knightsbridge, August 12, 1777.

You pay me a compliment I do not deserve in supposing that I am industriously employed on some useful work. For a long while I have been unusually idle, both as a preacher and as a writer. But my indolence was and is the result of obedience to medical prescription. I have been, at best, in a most fluctuating state of health for a year and a half past: and several times was in a near view of landing on that coast where the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick. At these times, I bless God, my cheerfulness never forsook me; and, which calls for still infinitely greater thankfulness, my sense of personal interest in his electing mercy, and in the great salvation of Jesus, was never darkened by a single cloud. For the last two months I have been abundantly, and almost miraculously, better. Whether my remaining days be few or many, I only pray and wish that they may be consecrated to the glory of the great Three-One.

And now to descend to the affairs of this world. The accounts of the extravagant and ridiculous manner in which, as you observe, my friend Mrs. M———'s birthday was celebrated at Bath, gave me extreme disgust; and have contributed to reduce my opinion of her magnanimity and good sense. Such contemptible vanity, and such childish affectation of mock-majesty, would have disgraced a much inferior understanding; and have sunk even the meanest character lower, by many degrees. If I live to see her again, I will rally her handsomely.

I must agree with you in feeling for the advancing miseries of our unhappy country. We are already become the jest and the contempt of all Europe. Never, surely, was a great and important empire so wantonly thrown away; and never was nation so infatuated before! However, when we recollect who it is that presides, invisibly, at the helm of all human affairs (see Daniel iv. 32, 35) we are reconciled to every appearance, melancholy as appearances may seem; and adore the infinite wisdom which secretly, but irresistibly, overrules even the vices, and follies, and the madness of men, to the accomplishment of its own designs.

I am happy to hear that yourself and family are well; and, if you were not a very particular friend, I should almost have grudged you the felicity you must have enjoyed in your late excursion to our much esteemed friends at Freshford.

More than compliments to you and your's conclude me

Your affectionate servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

LETTER LXX.

To MRS. A. G.—.

Knightsbridge, Lord's-day Evening, Nov. 2. 1777.

MADAM,

YOUR letter quite distresses me, because it places excellencies to my account which I feel myself to be totally unpossessed of. Among all the weak and unworthy servants of Christ, I am the unworthiest and the weakest. If you knew me as well as I know myself, you would be entirely of my mind.

For the Lord's sake let us look to Jesus only, and learn to cease from man. Christ is all in all. Every other person and thing are vile, and wretched, and hateful, but so far as he deigns to smile and bless. "Less than nothing and vanity" is the only motto that belongs to me. If he vouchsafe to wash me in his blood, and to save me by his infinitely free and glorious redemption; a more worthless and helpless sinner will never sing his praises in the land of glory.

Instead of commending me, pray for me; that I may be kept from evil, and devote my few days (in humble and earnest attempt at least) to the honour of his name.

If I wished you to retain your exalted opinion of me, I should, in my own defence, wave the honour of your acquaintance, which you so politely offer me. But, as I desire to undeceive you, and to appear just what I am, I shall be extremely happy to see you here any day in the forenoon after the present week is elapsed; which latter, viz., the remainder of the present week, I am to pass at the house of a friend who lives nine miles hence.

God have you in his keeping, and make you a partaker of the graces and consolations of his Spirit.—I am, with much respect,
Madam, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXXI.

To MR. E. K.—.

Knightsbridge, Nov. 22, 1777.

MY FRIEND AND BROTHER IN CHRIST,

By a letter which I have this moment received from Mr. Lake, I am informed that you are apprehensive of the speedy approach of death: and that you are particularly desirous of seeing me; or, if that cannot be, of at least hearing from me, before the great change comes.

As I am not certain of being able to wait on you so soon as I could wish, considering the long extent of way that interposes between us, and being willing to lose no time in assuring you how much I love you, and how earnestly I commend you to God, I seize the immediate opportunity of writing to you. Nor shall I cease to remember you in my worthless address at the throne of grace, both publicly and in private.

The time, however, is perhaps arrived, which eminently calls upon you to cease entirely from man. Forget me; forget even your family; forget all your earthly friends, so far as to lose sight of them: and look only to Jesus, the glorious Author and faithful Finisher of salvation. Repose your confidence on his alone blood, righteousness, and intercession. He represented you on the cross; he bears your name on his breast, and on the palms of his hands, in heaven; he sympathizes with you in all your pains and sorrows; and will take care of you, unto death, through death, and to all eternity. May his comforting Spirit make these blessings clear to your view, and powerfully seal upon your heart a sense and enjoyment of your personal interest in them.

Leave Providence to take care of your wife and children. And leave the covenant-grace of Father, Son, and Spirit, to take charge of you. Nor do I doubt that, whether we meet again or not in this valley of tears, we shall sing together for ever, in the Jerusalem above. So believes, and so prays, your old friend and ransomed fellow-sinner,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. I shall hold myself greatly indebted to Mr. Lake for informing me, from time to time, how the Lord deals with you.

LETTER LXXII.

To MR. F.

Knightsbridge, Nov. 27, 1777.

DEAR SIR,

If I rightly understood you yesterday, the case of conscience proposed by your friend, is this:

"He lives in a part of England, where the gospel is not preached by the clergy of the established church. 'But the gospel is preached in a neighbouring congregation of dissenters. He is compelled, therefore, either not to hear the gospel preached at all, or to hear it at a dissenting meeting-house.—Query: Is it his duty to communicate with the dissenters as well as to hear them? Or may he, with a safe conscience, continue only to hear them, and still maintain his communion with the Church of England?'

For my own part, I am most clearly of opinion,

(1.) That, if he cannot hear the church of England doctrines preached in a parish-church (which is terribly the case in some thousands of places), he is bound in conscience to hear those truths where they can be heard: was it in a barn, in a private house, in a field, or on a dunghill.—But,

(2.) I am no less clearly convinced that he is not under the smallest necessity of breaking off from the communion of the Church established.

Some of my reasons are these:

1. Your friend's love to the Church-doctrines (i. e. to the gospel of grace) is the very thing that forces him to forsake the church-walls as a hearer. But this need not force him from communicating there. It should rather bind him more closely and firmly to a Church whose doctrines and sacraments are holy, harmless, and undefiled; and alike remote from error, superstition, and licentiousness.

2. Our blessed Lord himself communicated with the established Church of Judæa; though its ministers and people were as deeply degenerated from the purity and power of God's truths as the present ministers and people of the Church of England are, for the most part, now.—That our Lord actually did thus communicate in the Jewish church (fallen as its professors were) is evident, from his celebration of the pass-over antecedently to his institution of the Holy Supper, in the evening of the very night wherein he was betrayed.

3. The goodness or badness of a parish minister neither adds nor detracts from the virtue and value of the sacraments he dispenses. Judas appears to have preached the gospel, and to have wrought miracles. Was the gospel, or were those miracles, at all the worse on his account? No: in no wise.—“But the minister of my parish does not preach the gospel.” Be it so. You do right, therefore, in not hearing him. Nevertheless, though (in this respect) he out-sins Judas himself, why should that unhappy circumstance make you quarrel with, and absent yourself from, the communion service of the Church?

4. I can set my own probatum est to the conduct I am now recommending. For several years after I was made acquainted with the grace of God, I chiefly resided in a place where I was obliged either to starve my soul by never sitting under the ministry of the word, or to go for it to a dissenting meeting house. I made not a moment's hesitation in choosing the latter; and would again pursue the same line, if Providence was again to place me in similar circumstances. But, though I heard the gospel constantly at meeting (because I could hear it no where else), I constantly and strictly communicated in the church only. I know that this was pleasing to God, by the many happy soul seasons I enjoyed, both at the Lord's table, and in the separate assembly. And yet (as you may judge from my leaving them as preachers) the clergymen, at whose hands I received the memorials of Christ's dying love knew no more of the gospel than so many stocks or stones.

5. Let a parish minister be ever so spiritually blind and dead, the liturgy remains the same. Blessed be God, the clergy are forced to read it; and to administer the Lord's supper, and other offices, according to its admirable and animating form of sound words.

6. While your friend communicates in the Church of England he is at full liberty to hear the gospel elsewhere: But,

Should he communicate with a dissenting church, he must first so far become one of them as to hear the gospel in great measure, if not entirely, among them only. Such a transfer of communion, therefore, would resemble tying himself by the leg (or rather nailing himself by the ear) to a single tree, in preference to enjoying the full range of God's garden. I have seen so very many instances of this, in a course of more than two-and-twenty years observation, that no antecedent promises, professions, or protestations to the contrary (made to a new convert, by any of those religious assemblies), would have the least weight on my judgment of this matter.

Thus I have, agreeably to your desire, signified a few of those reasons which have long had great influence in determining my own mind. Influence so very great and decisive that, I am thoroughly persuaded, was the glorious company of apostles to live again on earth at this very time, and to live in England, not one of them, I verily believe, would be a dissenter from our established church: though they would all deeply lament the dreadful state of spiritual, of doctrinal, and of moral declension, to which the greatest part of us are reduced. May God inform and teach your friend the way in which he ought to go, and for ever guide him with his eye! With which prayer for him, for you, and for myself, I remain,

Sir, your servant in Christ,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXXIII.

TO MR. VALLANCE.

Knightsbridge, Dec. 1, 1777.

DEAR SIR,

ON the cover of last month's magazine I read the following notice: "Thanks to Minimus for his pious meditation." Now, as I am the only person who ever appeared in your magazine under the signature of Minimus, and as I never sent you any meditation, whether pious or impious, since I surrendered my editorship of the said magazine [in July last], and, as it is generally known that the papers signed Minimus were written by me;—it will be both using me extremely ill, and also look like a desire, on your part, to palm a deception on your reader, if you permit any future paper, of which I am not the author, to bear the signature above-mentioned.

Not doubting that, on further consideration you will see the justice and propriety of this hint, and act accordingly; I remain, sir,

Your affectionate friend and servant,
AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXXIV.

TO J. W——, Esq.

Knightsbridge, Dec. 30, 1777.

SIR,

I THROW myself on your candour and politeness for your pardon of the present freedom, taken by a person who has not the honour of being known to you. The favour which I presume to solicit is, that you would be so obliging as to communicate to me such leading particulars as you may recollect concerning a late friend of yours, who was one of the greatest, and yet (by a fate peculiarly strange) one of the obscurest men whom this island ever produced: I mean Mr. Baxter, the metaphysician, who dedicated the 3rd volume of his chief work to you. I have a very cogent reason for wishing to acquire authentic and exact information of the times and places of his birth and death; and of such other principal circumstances, as may merely suffice to perpetuate the outlines of his personal history; which, in point of diffusiveness, need not be more prolix than is the letter I now address to you. I am, &c.

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXXV.

TO THE REV. DR. PRIESTLEY.

Knightsbridge, Jan. 20, 1778.

I AM much your debtor, sir, for your late polite favour from Calne; but especially for the obliging present of your Disquisitions concerning Matter and Spirit; and of the Appendix, concerning necessity. I have read them with great attention; and, as you condescend to request my opinion of those ingenious pieces, you shall have it, with the most transparent unreserve.

I need not say anything as to the article of necessity, because you well know that I have the honour to coincide, almost entirely, with your own view of that great subject. Permit me, however to ask, en passant, in what part of any printed work of mine I "seem to think that the torments of hell will not be eternal?" You yourself, dear sir, I doubt not, will, on a calm review, be the first to condemn your own temerity, in having publicly advanced a conjecture totally unwarranted on my part: and I am equally disposed to believe that this will be the last liberty of the kind which you will venture to take, either with me or with any other man. You must be sensible that not a word on the nature or the duration of future punishment ever passed between you and me, either in writing, or in personal converse. Consequently, you must be entirely unacquainted with my ideas of that awful subject: and, as such, were totally unqualified to advance the insinuation of which I have such just reason to complain.

With regard to your "Disquisitions," &c., I would observe,

1. That I can subscribe to no more than to one moiety of them. I still consider materialism as equally absurd in itself, and atheistical in its tendency.

But, 2. The perusal of your book gave me no surprise; because I have for a considerable time past viewed you as a secret materialist: whose favourite principle, like the workings of a subterranean fire, would at last break forth into open birth.

3. Nor has this publication lessened, in the smallest degree, my respect and esteem for its author. You have a right to think for yourself; and to publish the result of your thoughts to the world. If my own brother was of a different judgment as to this point, I should set him down for an enemy to the indefeasible prerogatives of human nature.

4. I revere and admire real probity, wherever I see it. Artifice, duplicity, and disguise, I cannot away with. Transparency is, in my opinion, the first and the most valuable of all social virtues. Let a man's principles be black as hell, it matters not to me, so he have but integrity to appear exactly what he is. Give me the person whom I can hold up, as I can a piece of crystal, and see through him. For this, among many other excellencies, I regard and admire Dr. Priestley.

5. I must acknowledge, sir, that, in the foregoing part of your "Disquisitions," you throw no small quantity of light on the nature of matter at large. My apprehensions concerning visible substance are, in several important respects, corrected and improved by your masterly observations on that subject. I wish you had stopt at matter, which you evidently do understand, and better, perhaps, than any other philosopher on earth, and not meddled with spirit, whose acquaintance, it is very plain, you have not cultivated with equal assiduity.

6. Bishop Berkeley tells me that I am all spirit, without a single particle of matter belonging to me. Dr. Priestley, on the other head, contends that I am all body, untenanted and unanimated by any immaterial substance within. Put these two theories together, and what will be the product? That my sum total, and that of every other man, amounts to just nothing at all. I have neither body nor soul. I have no sort of existence whatever. Here it may be alleged "That the two systems cannot be thrown together, as being totally incompatible." I answer: Why may not Bishop Berkeley's word go as far as Dr. Priestley's, and the doctor's as far as the bishop's? Though, when all is done, the best way, in my opinion, is to cease from both, and to believe neither.

7. The arguments for absolute and universal materialism, drawn (or rather pretendedly drawn) from rational and philosophic sources, appear to me prodigiously forced, lame, and inconclusive. And, if we take Scripture into the account, not all the subtily nor all the violence of criticism will ever be able to establish your system on that ground. What wretched work do you yourself make with those few texts which you venture to quote and strive to obviate, wherein, plena et prima facie, man is spoken of as a being compounded of matter and spirit!

Can you bear this plain dealing? If you can, give me your hand. And I most heartily wish that all who differ from you, and especially that all who may commence your public antagonists, may treat you, as I ever desire to do, with the respect due to your virtues and your talents.

How is your health? Beware of too close application, and of too intense exertions of mind. I, for my own part, can most heartily subscribe to these remarks of the apocryphal writer: "The thoughts of mortal men are miserable, and our devices are but uncertain. For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthy tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth on many things. Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth; and with labour do we find the things that are before us; but the things which are in heaven who hath searched out? And thy counsel who hath known, except thou give wisdom, and send thy Holy Spirit from above?" — May that Holy Spirit shining on his written word, and shining into our hearts, be a light to the paths of the much-esteemed friend to whom I am writing; and the paths of his Obliged and humble servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY

LETTER LXXXVI.

TO MRS. FOWLER.

Knightsbridge, Feb. 20, 1778

DEAR MADAM,

KNOWING that the officious zeal of numerous visitants, however well meant, occasions more trouble than relief during the first impressions that result from so trying a dispensation as that under which God is now exercising you; I, for this reason, wave presenting you with my personal condolences, and request yourself and your amiable family to accept my written respects.

You and yours are deeply on my heart, before the mercy-seat. Has the Holy Spirit yet brought you to that point whither faith invariably tends, and in which it will always ultimately rest? viz., "It is the Lord; let him do as seemeth him good." That your husband's God is and will be your God, even to the end, and without end, I believe with the fullest assurance. May he likewise be the God of all your offspring! It is a great, an unspeakably great thing, to be born again. How far that most momentous work has taken place on their souls, I know not. But may they ever tread in the religious footsteps of their deservedly honoured father; and never forget that the same blessed and triumphant consolations which enlivened his last hours will also felicitate their lives, and brighten their deaths, if effectual grace render them partakers of like precious faith with him, in the righteousness of our God and Saviour.

The presence of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Remember, that "your Maker is your husband;" a husband who never dies, and who changes not. My kindest and most sympathising respects attend the two young ladies, and both the gentlemen. Adieu, until I have an opportunity of assuring you by word of mouth, how much

I am, &c.,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

LETTER LXXXVII.

TO MR. HUSSEY.

Broad Hembury, March 19, 1778.

VERY DEAR SIR,

THE hospitable kindness of my old friend at Salisbury detained me at that place until Monday last ; in the afternoon of which day I set forward for my own parish, and arrived here on Tuesday.

I cannot boast of any great effects produced by the journey, and by change of air. If my hoarseness abates, my cough comes on with redoubled violence ; and if my cough grows favourable, the hoarseness returns. But welcome, ten thousand times welcome, the whole will of God. I trust, his Spirit has begun to render me passive in his blessed hand, and to turn me as clay to the seal. I am enabled to be more than resigned : I am thankful for his every dispensation, knowing them to be all ordered in faithfulness and love.

I was unable to preach, while at Salisbury ; and begin to apprehend that I must not attempt to preach at my own church here next Sunday. But though such absolute uselessness is the most afflictive part of my present visitation, yet even this I can leave with God my Saviour, who is the governing head of his family both in heaven and earth, and orders all things well.

It is still my hope and my intention to return to town in the course of next week. I am to have a sale of my furniture in my house here on Monday and Tuesday next ; and I trust the whole of that business will be accomplished in those two days, without detaining me longer. But, if otherwise, may I not venture to defer my return until Monday the 30th, or Tuesday the 31st of this present month ? I am never fond of worldly business, and am now particularly disqualified for managing it well : but when once undertaken, I deem it my duty to go through with it, in the best manner I am able.

Dear Mrs. Hussey, yourself, and all the flock of Christ who worship with us at Orange-street, are much and deeply on my heart. And if I, a sinful, dying worm, feel such glowing affection for the people of God : oh, with what intenseness must the Almighty Father love those whom he ordained to eternal life, before all worlds ; and whom he gave to his Son to save, and for whom he gave up the Son himself to the death of the cross ! How astonishingly, also, must Jesus have loved his people, when he consented to discharge their twofold debt of perfect obedience and penal suffering ! And how are they loved by the most holy and blessed Spirit of grace, who converts, comforts, sanctifies, and seals them to the day of redemption !

May that three-fold love, the three-fold cord that can never be broken, be the present and eternal rejoicing of my much valued Mr. and Mrs. Hussey, and of their Obliged and affectionate servant,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

P. S. I hope you had my letter from Sarum, dated the 11th instant. It would rejoice me to have one from you

LETTER LXXVIII.

To MR. HUSSEY.

EVER DEAR SIR,

God's good providence brought me hither yesterday, early in the afternoon, quite unfatigued by my journey, and rejoicing in spirit before him. It can hardly be expected that so short a time should have any very salutary effect on complaints so fixed as mine : my voice, however, has been much better to-day than for three weeks past.

My mind is quite at rest. All my affairs, respecting both this world and a better, are completely settled. My salvation was provided for in the covenant of grace, from all eternity, and sealed by the finished redemption of my adorable Saviour. My temporal business is all settled to my satisfaction, by the completion of my last will and testament, before I left London. So that I have, at present, nothing to do, but to sing in the ways of the Lord, that great are the glory and the goodness of the Lord.

I am uncertain whether I shall see Broad Hembury late in this week, or early in the next. When you favour me with a line be so good as to direct to me, simply, at Broad Hembury, Honiton.

As an old friend whom I have not seen for many years has just now called at Dr. Baker's in order to see me, I am obliged to be very concise. I shall depend, if the Lord permit, on hearing from you when I am in Devonshire. And it gives me great happiness to be able to inform you that I fully design, with the leave of my heavenly father, to be in town again before the last Sunday in this month. God only can tell how deeply my Christian friends, and the dear people at Orange-street in particular, dwell upon my heart. May they pray for me, as I also for them. Remember me, most kindly and respectfully, to dear Mrs. Hussey, Mr. and Mrs. Ward, of Westminster, and all others who condescend to inquire after the meanest of my Lord's redeemed sinners. I have not room to mention a quarter of the persons by name whom I love in the Lord : but all our names are written on his breast.

Adieu, dear sir,

am deeply and ever yours,

AUGUSTUS TOPLADY.

AN ANSWER TO THE FOLLOWING QUESTION,

“WHETHER POPULAR APPLAUSE CAN YIELD SOLID SATISFACTION TO A TRULY GREAT MIND?”

REAL greatness of mind includes whatever is noble, worthy, and exalted: of course, independency is essential to it. If the postulatam be granted (and I see not how it can be denied), the next inquiry will be, Whether a person, whose satisfaction, in whole or in part, is suspended on the applause of others, can be called an independent man? If he may, it would follow, that greediness of popularity does not infer dependence; if he cannot, it will follow, that a person who drudges for popular applause is not possessed of a truly great mind. Add to this that all motives to public usefulness which arise from principles merely selfish are very far from being indicative of magnanimity. This exalted quality, soaring superior to all the little arts of self-recommendation and personal aggrandizement, shuts self out of the question: and regards only the welfare of others, not their praise. Thus, for instance, a truly patriotic statesman, or a truly conscientious minister of Christ, aims not at the evanid applause, but at the solid benefit of those for whom he labours: nay, one actuated by these elevated views would, to serve mankind substantially, even run the risk of doing good to them against their wills, though he was sure of suffering in their estimation for doing it. Such disinterested benevolence and such heroic beneficence are as shining and conclusive marks as can be given for a mind truly great. Besides, it puts a truly magnanimous man on too low and despicable a footing to suppose him capable of sinking into the meanest of all pursuits, by commencing an angler for fame, and building any part of his mental happiness on the unstable basis of popular breath. A really great person does not live, as the camelion has been vulgarly supposed to do, on air, but on that which will yield sure and solid support, when every exterior happiness fails. The sense of divine favour, universal and disinterested love to mankind, uncorrupt intention, and integrity of action, in a word, the mens conscia recti, are what constitute the felicity of one who deserves the name of man. Add to this, that real magnanimity is absolutely inconsistent with pride. Of all vices, pride is the meanest, and the most truly contemptible. But pride is the very basis of that wretched ambition which terminates in the affectation of applause; consequently, a mind truly great cannot degenerate into this inverted ambition; unless meanness and magnanimity are terms synonymous. That just praise which usually attends characters and actions truly great and good, is a deserved consequence of those actions, but ought not to be the motive to performing them. Depraved as mankind are, I yet hope and believe that we have many useful persons, both in the learned, civil, and religious world, who disdain so base a principle of action: and that the love of fame is a passion not quite so universal as a late ingenious satirist imagined. The love of truth, the love of beneficence, and the love of justice, or, in other words, the love of God and the love of man, are the predominant and exciting principles in every breast which genuine greatness warms. I would mention one argument more.

The mind whose satisfaction is at all founded on popular eclat must be in itself extremely fickle; and a mere Proteus, ready, on every occasion, to vary its determinations, and to shape its measures, according to the mutability of the multitude, in order to preserve the applause already gained. A person under the unhappy influence of so base and paltry a passion must alter with the times, and swim with the stream, right or wrong, and, like the camelion just mentioned, assume any colour next him, for fear of losing that estimation which his past compliances had acquired him. Now a truly great man can never be a voluntary slave; but the man whose leading passion is love of praise makes himself a voluntary slave for life; therefore, it is impossible for one under so despicable a bias to be a truly great man. To descend from argument to plain matter of fact. If any person doubts whether popular applause be that unsatisfactory thing which I have described it, he need only go a few miles out of town, to a place called Hayes, and there he will see, with his own eyes, that popular applause, however it may tickle a man's vanity for a while, will, if he has not something more solid for his mind to feed on, leave him, sooner or later, miserable, contemptible, and unsatisfied. I know but of one truly great man who was a professed lover of popular applause, and that was the illustrious Cicero: but it should be remembered that that consummate statesman, patriot, and philosopher flourished in the very dregs of the Roman commonwealth; when public virtue and public liberty (which will always, at the long run, stand or fall together) were expiring. At such a time, to love Cicero and to love virtue, to love Cicero and to love liberty, were the same thing. Of this that most accomplished man could not but be conscious, and, it may be, he was ambitious of popular estimation, at the critical time, in hopes of being able, by the credit he sought and deserved, to give a happy turn to the public affairs, and make the scale preponderate in favour of his sinking country; all which, he well knew, it would be impossible for him to effect by any counsels he could give, or any measures he could take, unless he could previously secure the approbation of the people he wished to save. So that Cicero's unbounded thirst of praise seems to have arisen purely and solely from the love he bore to the noblest republic that ever subsisted, and he coveted popularity, not for his own sake, or for any solid satisfaction it yielded to himself as an individual; but, as matters then stood, he considered the acquisition of universal esteem as the medium of his country's welfare, and the only possible expedient which could retrieve it from the ruin which then threatened, and with which it was soon after actually overwhelmed, notwithstanding the manifold and almost supernatural efforts of that great man to avert the blow. Or even supposing that Cicero, with all his philosophy and virtue, had some remains of vanity in him, which he sought to gratify, by standing a perpetual candidate for praise (which, however, his character and conduct in all other respects forbid us to believe); yet even on this hypothesis it would not follow, that "popular applause can yield solid satisfaction to a truly great mind." For the gratification of vanity is one thing; satisfaction of mind is another. Vanity may be qualified, and yet the mind go unsatisfied; and vice versa. Besides, were it otherwise, we are not to adopt the foibles even of a great man, for they are foils and blemishes, in what character soever they are found. Though, for reasons already hinted, I cannot persuade myself that Cicero's was mere love of praise: it had the noblest of motives, and was directed to the best of ends. It was founded on love to his country, and a passionate ardour for her preservation. But admitting the reverse to be probable, it would not follow that because Cicero, the most shining person heathen antiquity has to boast of, deserved, and from consciousness of that desert (which we could not justly wonder at, in one who had not the advantage of gospel revelation to humble him) coveted applause: that therefore others have a right to claim the same privilege, since Cicero was so transcendent and peculiar a character that what was lawful for him to aspire to would be inexcusable in the rest of mankind. For though succeeding ages will, without doubt, give many millions of men to the world, yet possibly no age nor country will ever produce a second Cicero.

AN ANSWER

TO THE FOLLOWING QUESTION,

"Whether a Highwayman or a cheating Tradesman is the honestest Person?"

I SUPPOSE most persons will allow that plain dealing is one very important branch of honesty. Taking this for granted, the next inquiry will be, Who is the plain dealer? The highwayman, who openly avows his design, and says to you, frankly and above-board, Your money or your life! Or the sharking, shuffling tradesman, who, in a sly clandestine manner, abuses the confidence you repose in him, and cheats you, under the fictitious appearance of a fair dealer? Is not such a person as much a robber, to all intents and purposes, as the man who privily steals any part of your property out of your dwelling-house, or takes it from you by force on the highway?

Mutual confidence, such as is supposed to obtain between buyer and seller, is one main band of society; and every illicit practice that tends to render that confidence precarious is a step toward dissolving those social connections of which reciprocal confidence is the basis. Here again, I apprehend, the scale turns in favour of the highwayman. When he presents his pistol at the coach window (or it may be something that looks like one, merely to inspire terror, without even a possibility of doing real mischief), he gives you your alternative; he lets you know what you have to expect in case of refusal. You are not betrayed under a pretext of honesty, but expressly left to your own option, whether you will resign your purse, or stand to the consequence. I grant this to be a breach of the peace, and a breach of integrity: but then it is an open declared one, and you know what you have to do. And, let it be a breach of what it will beside, it is plainly no breach of trust: confidence is utterly disavowed on both sides, and therefore, though forced to part with some of your money, in order to secure your personal safety (and he, I think, is a fool who would not), yet you are not cheated of it. And though force of this kind, if universal, would be no less subversive of society than fraud; yet, since, by the care of the legislature, instances of the former are infinitely fewer than instances of the latter; going on the highway is not, upon the whole, and as matters now stand, either so general an evil, or so pernicious to the community, as cheating behind a counter.

Add to all this, that when I exchange my money for some certain commodity in lieu of it, I justly expect, and my tradesman professes to let me have, an equitable equivalent for the money so paid. But if, instead of such an equivalent, there is, in reality, no due proportion between the price I pay and the article I purchase; I am as much robbed by that insidious salesman as if he was to stop me on Hounslow Heath. I mean not to justify the gentlemen of the road. I am truly sensible that before a person can take that desperate and unlawful method of repairing his fortune, he must have bid adieu to virtue, and be lost to principle; we are not now exculpating villainy, but only weighing and comparing it.

In common life it is usual to distinguish between theft and robbery. But I apprehend these, though nominally and circumstantially different, are, in fact, one and the same.

The man who unjustly deprives another of his property, robs him: and there are but two ways of doing this; either privately or publicly. But, in this case, the thing itself suffers very great alteration, from the mode of doing it. I therefore set down the unfair tradesman, and the professed highwayman, for robbers. Only one conducts his scheme in an open manner; the other adds treachery to dishonesty. Robbery is robbery, either way: if there is any difference, it seems to consist in this: that robbery on the public road is robbery barefaced; whereas robbery in a shop is robbery disguised: which only makes it a worse species of the same genus.

One thing more deserves consideration. There have been instances of men who have robbed others on the highway, and some years after sent the persons they robbed anonymous letters, including bank bills to more than the amount of what they took: thus repaying, with interest, what they had formerly borrowed on the Heath. But I never yet heard of a cheating tradesman who made the same return to the customers he had defrauded: and, indeed, if a tradesman of that stamp was afterwards to act on this noble principle of recoiling integrity, he would have enough to do, and after all his unjust gains, have little or nothing to bequeath to his own family. However, as the instances of reimbursing the party robbed are rare, and as general conclusions cannot be formed from particular premises, I lay no great stress on the last observation: but for the reasons alleged before I must and do give it as my opinion, that though the cheating tradesman and the highway robber are both rogues, and great ones, yet that, upon the whole, the highwayman is the honestest rogue of the two. And as of two evils, prudence bids us choose the least, so, of the two villains, justice tells us that the least is to be preferred.

---

POEMS ON SACRED SUBJECTS,

WHEREIN THE

FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES OF CHRISTIANITY,

WITH

MANY OTHER INTERESTING POINTS, ARE OCCASIONALLY INTRODUCED.

WRITTEN BETWEEN FIFTEEN AND EIGHTEEN YEARS OF AGE.

---

*En, sanctos Manibus punset sumeret
Igne Vestatam se Musa facit; bene libera
Curis Libera Deliciisque, Jocisque et Amore profano.*

P R E F A C E.

THE following pieces are not recommended to the patronage of the Public on account of any excellency in themselves, but merely for the importance of their subjects; for, however defective the superstructure may be, its foundation is unquestionably good. All the doctrines here advanced, deducing their authority from the Sacred Scriptures, and their faithful epitome, the Homilies, and the Articles of the Established Church.

That the dignity of truths so momentous might be impaired as little as possible by the manner of expressing them, they are often introduced in the very words of the inspired writers, and our venerable Reformers; as every reader who is intimate with the invaluable books just mentioned cannot fail of observing.

Since all the essentials of religion are comprised in these two—sound faith, and a suitable course of obedience, every thing that may give offence to Christians dissenting from each other in points merely indifferently, is studiously avoided, and no particular tenets any where struck at, except one or two, which apparently tend to invalidate the authority of revelation, and, by consequence, to subvert the whole system of Christianity.

The Author wishes it was in his power to do justice to the sublime doctrines here treated of; but, until death is swallowed up in victory, the glorious privileges and ineffable benefits redounding to believers from the manifestation of God in the flesh cannot be perfectly conceived, much less properly expressed.

Let a continued sameness should pall, and want of method confuse the reader, the metre is occasionally varied, and the whole presents itself to his view, digested as follows :

- I. Petitionary Hymns.
  - II. Hymns of Praise.
  - III. Paraphrases on some select portion of Holy Writ.
  - IV. A few Pieces occasioned by the Death of Friends. And,
- Lastly, several pieces, not properly referable to any of the preceding heads, thrown together by way of Appendix.

PETITIONARY HYMNS.

Te Mente purâ et simpliciter
Te Voce te Cantu pio,
Rogare curvato genu,
Flendo et canendo discimus.

PRUDENTIUS.

Oratio est Oris Ratio, per quam intimæ Cordis
Nostrî manifestamus Deo.

POEM I.

- 1 REFINING Fuller, make me clean,
On me thy costly pearl bestow :
Thou art thyself the pearl I prize,
The only joy I seek below.
- 2 Disperse the clouds that damp my soul,
And make my heart unfit for thee :
Cast me not off, but seal me now
Thine own peculiar property.
- 3 Look on the wounds of Christ for me,
My sentence graciously relieve :
Extend thy peaceful sceptre, Lord,
And bid the dying traitor live.
- 4 Tho' I've transgress'd the rules prescrib'd,
And dar'd the justice I adore,
Yet let thy smiling mercy say,
Depart in peace, and sin no more.

POEM II. At entering into the Church.

- 1 FATHER of love, to thee I bend
My heart, and lift mine eyes ;
O let my pray'r and praise ascend
As odours to the skies.
- 2 Thy pard'ning voice I come to hear,
To know thee as thou art :
Thy ministers can reach the ear,
But thou must touch the heart.
- 3 O stamp me in thy heav'nly mould,
And grant thy word apply'd
May bring forth fruit an hundred fold
And speak me justify'd.

POEM III. When Service is ended.

- 1 LORD, let me not thy courts depart,
Nor quit thy mercy-seat,
Before I feel thee in my heart,
And there the Saviour meet.
- 2 Water the seed in weakness sown,
And ever more improve :
Make me a garden of thine own ;
May ev'ry flow'r be love !
- 3 O send my soul in peace away ;
For both my Lord hath bought :
And let my heart, exulting, say,
I've found the pearl I sought !

POEM IV. For the Morning.

- 1 JESUS, by whose grace I live,
From the fear of evil kept,
Thou hast lengthen'd my relieve,
Held in being while I slept.
With the day my heart renew ;
Let me wake thy will to do.
- 2 Since the last revolving dawn
Scatter'd the nocturnal cloud,
O, how many souls have gone,
Unprepar'd, to meet their God !
Yet thou dost prolong my breath,
Nor hast seal'd my eyes in death.
- 3 O that I may keep thy word,
Taught by thee to watch and pray !
To thy service, dearest Lord,
Sanctify th' present day :
Swift its fleeting moments haste,
Doom'd, perhaps, to be my last.
- 4 Crucify'd to all below,
Earth shall never be my care
Wealth and honour I forego,
This my only wish and care,
Thine in life and death to be,
Now and to eternity.

POEM V. For the Evening.

- 1 GOD of love, whose truth and grace
Reach unbounded as the skies,
Hear thy creature's feeble praise,
Let my ev'ning sacrifice
Mount as incense to thy throne,
On the merits of thy Son.
- 2 Me thy Providence has led Through another busy day :
Over me thy wings were spread,
Chasing sin and death away :
Thou hast been my faithful shield,
Thou my footsteps hast upheld.
- 3 Tho' the sable veil of night
Hides the cheering face of heav'n,
Let me triumph in the sight
Of my guilt in thee forgiv'n.
In my heart the witness feel,
See the great Invisible.

4 I will lay me down to sleep,
Sweetly take my rest in thee,
Ev'ry moment brought a step
Nearer to eternity:
I shall soon from earth ascend,
Quickly reach my journey's end.

5 All my sins imputed were
To my dear, incarnate God;
Bury'd in his grave they are,
Drown'd in his atoning blood:
Me thou wilt not now condemn,
Righteous and complete in him.

6 In the Saviour's right I claim
All the blessings he hath bought;
For my soul the dying Lamb
Hath a full redemption wrought;
Heaven through his desert is mine;
Christ's I am, and Christ is thine!

POEM VI. There is Mercy with Thee.

1 LORD, should'st thou weigh my righteousness,
Or mark what I have done amiss,
How should thy servant stand?
Tho' others might, yet surely I
Must hide my face, nor dare to cry
For mercy at thy hand.

2 But thou art loth thy bolts to shoot;
Backward and slow to execute
The vengeance due to me:
Thou dost not willingly reprove,
For all the mild effects of love
Are center'd, Lord, in thee.

3 Shine, then, thou all-subduing light,
The powers of darkness put to flight
Nor from me ever part:
From earth to heaven be thou my guide,
And O, above each gift beside,
Give me an upright heart.

POEM VII. In Sickness.

1 JESUS, since I with thee am one,
Confirm my soul in thee,
And still continue to tread down
The man of sin in me.

2 Let not the subtle foe prevail
In this my feeble hour:
Frustrate all the hopes of hell,
Redeem from Satan's pow'r.

3 Arm me, O Lord, from head to foot,
With righteousness divine;
My soul in Jesus firmly root,
And seal the Saviour mine.

4 Proportion'd to my pains below,
O let my joys increase,
And mercy to my spirit flow
In healing streams of peace.

5 In life and death be thou my God,
And I am more than safe:
Chastis'd by thy paternal rod,
Support me with thy staff.

6 Lay on me, Saviour, what thou wilt,
But give me strength to bear:
Thy gracious hand this cross hath dealt,
Which cannot be severe.

7 As gold refin'd may I come out,
In sorrow's furnace try'd;
Preserved from faithlessness and doubt,
And fully purify'd.

8 When, overwhelm'd with sore distress,
Out of the pit I cry,
On Jesus suffering in my place
Help me to fix mine eye.

9 When * marr'd with tears, and blood, and sweat,
The glorious Sufferer lay,
And in my stead sustain'd the heat
And burden of the day.

10 The pangs which my weak nature knows
Are swallow'd up in thine:
How numberless thy pond'rous woes!
How few, how light are mine!

11 O might I learn of thee to bear
Temptation, pain and loss!
Give me a heart inur'd to prayer,
And fitted to the cross.

12 Make me, O Lord, thy patient son;
Thy language mine shall be:
"Father, thy gracious will be done,
I take the cup from thee."

13 While thus my soul is fixt on him
Once fasten'd to the wood,
Safe shall I pass through Jordan's stream,
And reach the realms of God.

14 And when my soul mounts up to keep
With thee the marriage feast,
I shall not die, but fall asleep
On my Redeemer's breast.

POEM VIII. John xiv. 17. He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

1 SAVIOUR, I thy word believe,
My unbelief remove;
Now thy quick'ning Spirit give,
The unction from above;
Shew me, Lord, how good thou art,
My soul with all thy fulness fill:
Send the witness in my heart
The Holy Ghost reveal.

2 Dead in sin 'till then I lie,
Bereft of power to rise;
Till thy Spirit inwardly
Thy saving blood applies:
Now the mighty gift impart,
My sin erase, my pardon seal:
Send the witness, in my heart
The Holy Ghost reveal.

3 Blessed Comforter, come down,
And live and move in me;
Make my every deed thy own,
In all things led by thee:
Bid my every lust depart,
And with me O vouchsafe to dwell;
Faithful witness, in my heart
Thy perfect light reveal.

4 Let me in thy love rejoice,
Thy shrine, thy pure abode;
Tell me, by thine inward voice,
That I'm a child of God:
Lord, I choose the better part,
Jesus, I wait thy peace to feel;
Send the witness, in my heart
The Holy Ghost reveal.

5 Whom the world cannot receive,
O manifest in me:
Son of God, I cease to live,
Unless I live in thee
Now impute thy whole desert,
Restore the joy from which I fell:
Breathe the witness, in my heart
The Holy Ghost reveal.

POEM IX. On War.

I GREAT God, whom heav'n, and earth, and sea,
With all their countless hosts, obey,
Upheld by whom the nations stand,
And empires fall at thy command:

* Referring to his agony in the garden.

- 2 Beneath thy long suspended ire
Let papal Antichrist expire ;
Thy knowledge spread from sea to sea,
'Till every nation bows to thee.
- 3 Then shew thyself the prince of peace,
Make every hostile efforts cease ;
All with thy sacred love inspire,
And burn their chariots in the fire.
- 4 In sunder break each warlike spear ;
Let all the Saviour's liv'ry wear ;
The universal Sabbath prove,
The utmost rest of Christian love !
- 5 The world shall then no discord know,
But hand in hand to Canaan go,
Jesus, the peaceful king, adore,
And learn the art of war no more.

POEM X. Desiring to be given up to God.

- 1 O THAT my heart was right with thee,
And lov'd thee with a perfect love !
O that my Lord would dwell in me,
And never from his seat remove !
Jesus, remove th' impending load,
And set my soul on fire for God !
- 2 Thou seest I dwell in awful night
Until thou in my heart appear ;
Kindle the flame, O Lord, and light
Thine everlasting candle there :
Thy presence puts the shadows by ;
If thou art gone, how dark am I !
- 3 Ah ! Lord, how should thy servant see,
Unless thou give me seeing eyes ?
Well may I fall, if out of thee ;
If out of thee, how should I rise ?
I wander, Lord, without thy aid,
And lose my way in midnight's shade.
- 4 Thy bright, unerring light afford,
A light that gives the sinner hope ;
And from the house of bondage, Lord,
O bring the weary captive up ;
Thine hand alonè can set me free,
And reach my pardon out to me.
- 5 O let my prayer acceptance find,
And bring the mighty blessing down ;
With eye-salve, Lord, anoint the blind,
And seal me thine adopted son :
A fallen, helpless creature take,
And heir of thy salvation make.

M XI. Matt. viii. 25. Lord, save us, we perish.

- 1 PILOT of the soul, awake,
Save us for thy mercies' sake ;
Now rebuke the angry deep,
Save, O save thy sinking ship !
- 2 Stand at the helm, our vessel steer,
Mighty on our side appear ;
Saviour, teach us to descry
Where the rocks and quicksands lie.
- 3 The waves shall impotently roll,
If thou 'rt the anchor of the soul :
At thy word the wind shall cease,
Storms be hush'd to perfect peace.
- 4 Be thou our haven of retreat,
A rock to fix our wav'ring feet,
Teach us to own thy sovereign sway,
Whom the winds and seas obey.

XII. O that my ways were made so direct, &c.

- 1 O THAT my ways were made so strait,
And that the lamp of faith
Would, as a star, direct my feet
Within the narrow path !
- 2 O that thy strength might enter now,
And in my heart abide,

To make me as a faithful bow
That never starts aside !

- 3 O that I all to Christ were given,
(From sin and earth set free)
Who kindly laid aside his heaven,
And gave himself for me !
- 4 Not more the panting hart desires
The cool, refreshing stream
Than my dry, thirsty soul aspires
At being one with him.
- 5 Set up thine image in my heart ;
Thy temple let me be,
Bid every idol now depart
That fain would rival thee.
- 6 Still keep me in the heavenly path ;
Bestow the inward light ;
And lead me by the hand till faith
Is ripened into sight.

POEM XIII.

- 1 FATHER, to thee in Christ I fly,
What tho' my sins of crimson dye
For thy resentment call ?
My crimes he did on Calv'ry bear,
The blood that flow'd for sinners there
Shall cleanse me from them all.
- 2 Spirit divine, thy pow'r bring in,
O raise me from this depth of sin,
Take off my guilty load :
Now let me live through Jesu's death,
And, being justified by faith,
May I have peace with God !
- 3 Foul as I am, deserving hell,
Thou can'st not from thy throne repel
A soul that leans on God :
My sins at thy command shall be Cast as a stone into the sea—
The sea of Jesu's blood.

POEM XIV.

- 1 SUPREME High Priest, the pilgrim's light,
My heart for thee prepare,
Thine image stamp, and deeply write
Thy superscription there.
- 2 Ah ! let my forehead bear thy seal,
My arm thy badge retain,
My heart the inward witness feel
That I am born again !
- 3 Thy peace, O Saviour, shed abroad,
That every want supplies :
Then from its guilt my soul renew'd,
Shall, phoenix like, arise.
- 4 Into thy humble mansion come,
Set up thy dwelling here :
Possess my heart, and leave no room
For sin to harbour there.
- 5 Ah ! give me, Lord, the single eye,
Which aims at nought but thee :
I fain would live, and yet not I—
Let Jesus live in me.
- 6 Like Noah's dove, no rest I find
But in thy ark of peace :
Thy cross the balance of my mind,
Thy wounds my hiding-place.
- 7 In vain the tempter spreads the snare,
If thou my keeper art :
Get thee behind me, God is near,
My Saviour takes my part !
- 8 On him my spirit I recline,
Who put my nature on ;
His light shall in my darkness shine,
And guide me to his throne.
- 9 O that the penetrating sight,
And eagle's eye were mine

Undazzled at the boundless light,
I'd see his glory shine!

- 10 Ev'n now, by faith, I see him live
To crown the conquering few;
Nor let me linger here, but strive
To gain the prize in view.
- 11 Add, Saviour, to the eagle's eye,
The dove's aspiring wing,
To bear me upwards to the sky,
Thy praises there to sing!

POEM XV. Self Dedication.

- 1 JESUS, my Saviour, fill my heart
With nothing else but thee;
Now thy saving pow'r exert,
And more than conquer me:
Each intruding rival kill,
That hinders or obstructs thy reign:
All thy glorious might reveal,
And make me pure within.
- 2 Through my soul in mercy shine,
Thine Holy Spirit give;
Let him witness, Lord, with mine
That I in Jesus live;
Set me free from Satan's load,
The gift of Liberty dispense,
In my heart O shed abroad
Thy quick'ning influence.
- 3 Let the gifts bestow'd on me,
Live to thy praise alone;
Lord, the talents lent by thee
Are thine and not my own:
May I in thy service spend
All the graces thou has given,
Taken up, when time shall end,
To live and reign in heaven.

POEM XVI. In Temptation.

- 1 COMPASS'D by the foe, on thee
Feebly I presume to call;
Get thyself the victory,
Hold me, and I shall not fall:
On thy creature mercy shew,
Thine I am by purchase too.
- 2 Guard of my defenceless heart,
Wherefore hidest thou thy face?
Mercy's fountain head thou art,
Ever full of truth and grace;
Quell the roaring lion's pow'r,
Father, save me from this hour.
- 3 Sun of righteousness, arise,
Shed thy blissful rays on me;
Kindly listen to my cries,
Try'd by him who tempted thee:
Thou my helpless soul defend,
Keep me blameless to the end.
- 4 Rise in vengeance from thy seat,
Jesus, Lord, make haste to save;
Me to sift my soul as wheat,
Satan hath desired to have:
Let him not too far prevail,
Suffer not my faith to fail.
- 5 Try'd, afflicted, and distressed
By temptation's searching flame,
Tho', beneath its load oppress'd,
Now in heaviness I am,
I shall soon at freedom be,
More than conqueror in thee.
- 6 This affliction shall work out,
(Light and transient as it is)
When I am to Sion brought,
Everlasting joy and peace:
Here but for a moment try'd,
There for ever glorified.

POEM XVII.

- 1 O may I never rest
Till I find rest in thee;
'Till of my pardon here possess'd
I feel thy love to me!
Unseal my darken'd eyes,
My fetter'd feet unbind,
The lame shall, when thou say'st "Arise,
Run swifter than the hind.
- 2 O draw the alien near,
Bend the obdurate neck,
O melt the flint into a tear,
And teach the dumb to speak:
Turn not thy face away,
Thy look can make me clean;
Me in thy wedding robe array,
And cover all my sin.
- 3 Tell me, my God, for whom
Thy precious blood was shed;
For sinners! Lord, as such I come,
For such the Saviour bled:
Then raise a fallen wretch,
Display thy grace in me!
I am not out of mercy's reach,
Nor too far gone for thee.
- 4 Thou quickly wilt forgive,
My Lord will not delay;
Jesus, to thee the time I leave,
And wait the accepted day:
I now rejoice in hope
That I shall be made clean:
Thy grace shall surely lift me up
Above the reach of sin.
- 5 Hast thou not died for me,
And call'd me from below!
O help me to lay hold on thee,
And ne'er to let thee go!
Though on the billows toss'd,
My Saviour I'll pursue:
Awhile submit to bear his cross,
Then share his glory too.

POEM XVIII.

- 1 FROM Justice's consuming flame,
Saviour, I fly to thee;
O look not on me as I am,
But as I fain would be.
- 2 Deserted in the way I lie,
No cure for me is found:
Thou, good Samaritan, pass by,
And bind up every wound.
- 3 O may I in the final day
At thy right-hand appear!
Take thou my sins out of the way,
Who didst the burden bear.
- 4 What though the fiery serpent's bite
Hath poisoned ev'ry vein—
I'll not despair, but keep in sight
The wounds of Jesus slain.
- 5 My soul thou wilt from death retrieve,
For sorrow grant me joy,
Thy power is mightier to save
Than Satan's to destroy.

POEM XIX. After being surprised into Sin.

- 1 Ah! Give me, Lord, myself to see,
Against myself to watch and pray,
How weak am I, when left by thee,
How frail, how apt to fall away!
If but a moment thou withdraw,
That moment sees me break thy law.
- 2 Jesus, the sinner's only trust,
Let me now feel thy grace infus'd!
Ah! raise a captive from the dust,
Nor break a reed already bruise'd!

Visit me, Lord, in peace again,
Nor let me seek thy face in vain.

- 3 O gracious Lord, now let me find
Peace and salvation in thy name;
Be thou the eye-sight of the blind,
The staff and ancles of the lame;
My lifter up when'er I fall,
My strength, my portion, and my all.
- 4 Let thy meek mind descend on me,
Thy Holy Spirit from above:
Assist me, Lord, to follow thee,
Drawn by th' endearing cords of love;
Made perfect by thy cleansing blood,
Completely sav'd and born of God.

POEM XX. Christ the Light of his People.

- 1 I LIFT my heart and eyes to thee,
Jesus, thou unextinguished light:
My lantern, guide, and leader be,
My cloud by day, my fire by night.
- 2 Glory of Israel, shine within,
Unshadow'd, unclips'd appear;
O let thy beams dispel my sin,
Direct me by a friendly star.
- 3 The world a maze and lab'rinth is,
Be thou my thread and faithful clue;
Thy kingdom and thy righteousness
The only objects I pursue.
- 4 Light of the Gentiles, thee I hail!
Essential light, thyself impart!
Spirit of light, his face reveal;
And set thy signet on my heart.
- 5 Thy office is to enlighten man,
And point him to the heavenly prize;
The hidden things of God t' explain,
And chase the darkness from our eyes.
- 6 Shew me I have the better part,
The treasure hid with Christ in God;
Give me a perfect peace of heart,
And pardon through my Saviour's blood.

POEM XXI.

- 1 CHAIN'D to the world, to sin ty'd down,
In darkness still I lie;
Lord, break my bonds, Lord give me wings,
And teach me how to fly.
- 2 Instruct my feeble hands to war,
In me thy strength reveal,
To put my ev'ry lust to death,
And fight thy battles well.
- 3 Rend ev'ry veil that shades thy face,
Put on thine helmet, Lord;
My sin shall fall, my guilt expire,
Beneath thy conqu'ring sword.
- 4 Thou art the mighty God of hosts,
Whose counsels never fail;
Be thou my glorious chief, and then
I cannot but prevail.

POEM XXII.

- 1 O WHEN will thou my Saviour be,
O when shall I be clean,
The true, eternal sabbath see,
A perfect rest from sin!
Jesus, the sinner's rest thou art,
From guilt, and fear, and pain;
While thou art absent from my heart,
look for rest in vain.
- 2 The consolations of thy word,
My soul hath long upheld,
The faithful promise of the Lord,
Shall surely be fulfill'd:
I look to my incarnate God,
'Till he his work begin;

And wait 'till his redeeming blood
Shall cleanse me from all sin.

- 3 His great salvation I shall know,
And perfect liberty:
Onward to sin he cannot go,
Who'er abides in thee;
Added to the Redeemer's fold,
I shall in him rejoice:
I all his glory shall behold,
And hear my shepherd's voice.
- 4 O that I now the voice might hear,
That speaks my sins forgiv'n;
His word is past to give me here
The inward pledge of heav'n:
His blood shall over all prevail,
And sanctify the unclean;
The grace that saves from future hell,
Shall save from present sin.

POEM XXIII.

- 1 Jesus, thy light impart,
And lead me in thy path;
I have an unbelieving heart,
But thou can'st give me faith.
- 2 The work in me fulfil,
Which mercy hath begun;
I have a proud rebellious will,
But thou canst melt it down.
- 3 Sin on my heart is wrote,
I am throughout impure;
But my disease, O Lord, is not Too hard for thee to cure.
- 4 The darkness of my mind
Lies open to thy sight;
Jesus, I am by nature blind,
But thou canst give me light.
- 5 Send down thy Holy Ghost,
To cleanse and fill with peace;
For O, mine inward parts thou know'st
Are very wickedness.
- 6 Thy love all power hath,
Its power in me exert;
And give me living active faith,
That purifies the heart.
- 7 Unrival'd reign within,
My only sovereign be,
O crucify the man of sin,
And form thyself in me.
- 8 Thy blood's renewing might,
Can make the foulest clean;
Can wash the Ethiopian white,
And change the Leopard's skin.
- 9 That, Lord, can bring me nigh,
And wipe my sins away;
Can lift my abject soul on high,
And call me into day.
- 10 Fulfil thy gracious word,
And shew my guilt forgiv'n;
Bid me embrace my dying Lord,
And mount with him to heav'n.

POEM XXIV. The Christian's Wish.

- 1 EMPTIED of earth I fain would be;
The world, myself, and all but thee;
Only reserved for Christ that dy'd
Surrender'd to the crucify'd;
- 2 Sequester'd from the noise and strife,
The lust, the pomp, and pride of life.
For heav'n alone my heart prepare,
And have my conversation there.
- 3 O may I the Redeemer trace,
Invested with his righteousness!
This path, untr'd, I will pursue,
Nor slack while Jesus is in view.

- 4 Nothing save Jesus may I know,
My Father and companion thou !
Lord, take my heart, assert my right,
And put all other loves to flight.
- 5 My idols tread beneath thy feet,
And enter'd once, maintain thy seat;
Let Dagon fall before thy face,
The ark remaining in its place.
- 6 O lend me now a two-edg'd sword,
To slay my sins before the Lord;
With Abraham's knife, before thine eyes,
Each favourite Isaac sacrifice.

POEM XXV. [Before Meat.] 1 Cor. x. 31.

- 1 LORD, we invite thee here,
Vouchsafe to be our guest;
Jesus, do thou appear
The master of the feast;
Thy quick'ning presence let us prove,
And banquet on thy hidden love.
- 2 With manna from on high
Feed thine inheritance,
And come and sanctify
Our outward sustenance;
With it the inward food be giv'n,
The bread of life, the wine of heav'n.

POEM XXVI. For the Morning.

- 1 MY soul, can'st thou no higher rise,
To meet thy God, than this ?
Yet, Lord, accept my sacrifice,
Defective as it is.
- 2 Tune all my organs to thy praise,
And psalmist's muse impart;
And, with thy penetrating rays,
O melt my frozen heart.
- 3 Give me thyself the only good,
And ever with me stay;
Whose faithful mercies are renew'd
With each returning day.
- 4 Ah! guide me with a Father's eye,
Nor from my soul depart;
But let the day-star from on high
Illuminate my heart.
- 5 This day preserve me without sin,
Spotted in thy ways;
And hear me while I usher in
The welcome dawn with praise.
- 6 Far as the East from West remove
Each earthly vain desire,
And raise me on the wings of love,
'Till I can mount no higher.

POEM XXVII. For the Evening.

- 1 THOU unexhausted mine of bliss,
From whence all comforts flow;
Inspire me with that perfect peace,
Which only Christians know.
- 2 The curtains of thy love extend
Around my calm abode,
As I began, so may I end
My ev'ry day with God.
- 3 My life unhurt, thine hand hath kept,
Accept the praise I pay;
For all the dangers I've escaped,
And mercies of the day.
- 4 Far, far away the tempter chase,
My soul from terror keep;
Let angels fill this hallow'd place,
And guard me as I sleep.
- 5 O wash out ev'ry sin whereby
This day I have transgress'd;
And seal my pardon ere I give
My slumbring eye-lids rest.

- 6 Prepare me for the bed of death,
Be that my hourly thought,
That when I yield my latest breath
I may be found with God.

POEM XXVIII. He is the Propitiation of our Sins.

- 1 O THOU, that hear'st the prayer of faith,
Wilt thou not save a soul from death
That casts itself on thee ?
I have no refuge of my own,
But fly to what my Lord hath done
And suffer'd once for me.
- 2 Slain in the guilty sinner's stead,
His spotless righteousness I plead,
And his availing blood:
Thy merit, Lord, my robe shall be,
Thy merit shall atone for me,
And bring me near to God.
- 3 Then snatch me from eternal death,
The spirit of adoption breathe,
His consolations send;
By him some word of life impart,
And sweetly whisper to my heart,
"Thy Maker is thy friend."
- 4 The King of errors then would be
A welcome messenger to me,
That bids me come away;
Unclog'd by earth or earthly things,
I'd mount upon his sable wings
To everlasting day.

POEM XXIX. Hab. ii. 14. For the Earth shall be filled, &c.

- 1 BRING the kingdom, Lord, make haste,
Bring on the glorious day,
From the greatest to the least,
When all shall own thy sway:
When the convert world, with grief,
Shall see the error of their ways,
Lay aside their unbelief,
And yield unto thy grace.
- 2 In thy gospel-chariot, Lord,
Drive through earth's utmost bound;
Spread the odour of thy word
Through all the nations round:
Fill the darken'd earth with light,
Thine own victorious cause advance;
Take the heathen as the right
Of thine inheritance.
- 3 In our day expose to view,
The standard of the Lamb:
Bid the nations flock thereto,
Who never knew thy name;
Let them quit the downward road,
Compell'd thy gospel to receive;
Turn'd from Satan unto God,
With one consent believe.

POEM XXX.

- 1 REDEEMER, whither should I flee,
Or how escape the wrath to come ?
The weary sinner flies to thee
For shelter from impending doom:
Smile on me, gracious Lord, and shew
Thyself the friend of sinners now.
- 2 Beneath the shadow of thy cross,
The heavy-laden soul finds rest:
Let me esteem the world as dross,
So I may be of Christ possess'd !
I borrow ev'ry joy from thee,
For thou art life and light to me.
- 3 Close to my Saviour's bloody tree,
My soul, untir'd, shall ever cleave;
Both scourg'd and crucified with thee,
With Christ resolved to die and live.

My pray'r, my grand ambition this,
Living and dying to be his.

- 4 O nail me to the sacred wood,
There hold me by the Spirit's chain,
There seal me with thy fast'ning blood,
Nor ever let me loose again :
There may I bow my suppliant knee,
And own no other Lord but thee !

POEM XXXI.

- 1 LORD, stand not off, come nearer still,
Illuminate my darken'd soul,
Renew my heart, correct my will,
Make the polluted leper whole.
- 2 Behold my struggles, Lord, and set
My sin-bound soul at liberty :
Give me thine hand to break the net,
And bid the fetter'd slave be free.
- 3 My own desert I cannot plead,
My purest silver is but dross :
Let Jesus' merits intercede,
O nail my errors to the cross.
- 4 Fain would I mount to thee, my crown,
And gain the realms of endless light
But fetter'd earth still keeps me down,
And sin impediates my flight.
- 5 Father, to me impart thy bread,
To me thine healing manna give ;
On life eternal let me feed,
That my diseased soul may live.
- 6 Unworthy to intreat thy grace,
Unworthier still thy grace t' obtain,
I plead my Surety's righteousness,
Nor shall my plea be urg'd in vain.

POEM XXXII. Where two or three are gathered together in my name, &c.

- 1 Jesus, God of love, attend,
From thy glorious throne descend ;
Answer now some waiting heart,
Now some harden'd soul convert :
To our Advocate we fly,
Let us feel Emanuel nigh ;
Manifest thy love abroad,
Make us now the sons of God.
- 2 Hover round us, King of kings,
Rise with healing in thy wings ;
Melt our obstinacy down,
Cause us to become thine own :
Set, O set the captives free,
Draw our backward souls to thee ;
Let us all from thee receive
Light to see and life to live.
- 3 Prostrate at thy mercy seat
Let us our Beloved meet ;
Give us in thyself a part,
Deep engraven on thine heart ;
Let us hear thy pard'ning voice,
Bid the broken bones rejoice ;
Condemnation do away,
O make this the happy day !
- 4 Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
Join to seek and save the lost :
Raise some sinner to thy throne,
Add a jewel to thy crown !
Are we not, without thy light,
Darken'd with Egyptian night ?
Light of light, thy pow'r exert,
Lighthen each benighted heart !
- 5 Prayer can mercy's door unlock ;
Open, Lord, to us that knock !
Us the heirs of glory seal,
With thy benediction fill :
Holy Spirit, make us his,
Visit ev'ry soul in peace ;
Give our vanquish'd hearts to say,
Love divine has won the day !

- 6 Give the heavy-laden rest,
Christ make known in ev'ry breast,
Void of thee we quickly die,
Turn our sackcloth into joy :
Witness all our sins forgiv'n,
Grant on earth a glimpse of heav'n ;
Bring the joyful tidings down
Fit us for our future crown.

- 7 Let us chaunt melodious hymns,
Loud as those of cherubims ;
Join with heart and tongue to bless
Christ our strength and righteousness .
All our praise to Him belongs,
Theme of our sublimest songs ;
Object of our choicest love,
Thee we laud with hosts above.
- 8 Thee we hail with joint acclaim,
Shout the glories of thy name ;
Ever may we feel thee thus,
Dear Immanuel, God with us !
Prince of peace, thy people see,
All our thanks we aim at thee ;
Deign our tribute to receive,
Praise is all we have to give.

POEM XXXIII.

- 1 COME from on high, my King and God,
My confidence thou art ;
Display the virtue of thy blood,
And circumcise my heart.
- 2 From heav'n, thy holy place, on me
Descend in mercy down ;
Water of life, I thirst for thee,
To know thee for my own.
- 3 Rend, O rend the guilty veil,
That keeps me from my God ;
Remove the bar, and let me feel
That I am thine abode.
- 4 O might this worthless heart of mine
The Saviour's temple be !
Empty'd of ev'ry love but thine,
And shut to all but thee !

POEM XXXIV. I know that in my Flesh dwelleth no good Thing.

- 1 LORD, is not all from thee ?
Is not all fulness thine ?
Whate'er of good there is in me,
O Lord, is none of mine.
- 2 Each holy tendency
Did not thy mercy give ?
And what, O Saviour, what have I
That I did not receive ?
- 3 I cannot speak a word,
Or think a thought that's good,
But what proceedeth from the Lord ;
And cometh forth from God.
- 4 Jesus, I know full well,
What my best actions are ;
They'd sink my grievous soul to hell,
If unrefin'd they were.
- 5 Myself and all I do,
O sprinkle with thy blood ;
Renew me, Saviour, ere I go,
To stand before my God.
- 6 I of myself have nought,
That can his justice please ;
Not one right word, nor act, nor thought,
But what I owe to grace.

POEM XXXV. Refuge in the Righteousness of Christ.

- 1 FROM thy supreme tribunal, Lord,
Where justice sits severe,

I to thy mercy seat appeal,
And beg forgiveness there.

- 2 Tho' I have sinn'd before the throne,
My Advocate I see :
Jesus, be thou my Judge, and let
My sentence come from thee.
- 3 Lo, weary to thy cross I fly,
There let me shelter find :
Lord, when thou call'st thy ransoms'd home,
O leave me not behind !
- 4 I joyfully embrace thy love
To fallen man reveal'd ;
My hope of glory, dearest Lord,
On thee alone I build.
- 5 The law was satisfy'd by him
Who flesh for me was made :
Its penalty he underwent,
Its precepts he obey'd.
- 6 Desert and all self-righteousness
I utterly forego ;
My robe of everlasting bliss,
My wedding garment thou.
- 7 The spotless Saviour liv'd for me,
And died upon the Mount ;
Th' obedience of his life and death
Is placed to my account.
- 8 Can'st thou forget that awful hour,
That sad, tremendous scene,
When thy dear blood on Calvary
Flow'd out at ev'ry vein ?
- 9 No, Saviour, no ; thy wounds are fresh,
Even now they intercede ;
Still, in effect, for guilty man
Incessantly they bleed.
- 10 Thine ears of mercy still attend
A contrite sinner's cries,
A broken heart, that groans for God,
Thou never wilt despise.
- 11 O love incomprehensible,
That made thee bleed for me !
The Judge of all hath suffer'd death
To set his prisoner free !

POEM XXXVI. For Pardon of Sin.

- 1 JESUS, thy feet I will not leave,
Till I the precious gift receive,
The purchas'd pearl possess :
Impart it, gracious Lord, while I
With supplication's humblest cry,
Invest the throne of grace.
- 2 Baptize me with the Holy Ghost ;
Make this the day of Pentecost,
Wherein my soul may prove
Thy spirit's sweet renewing power,
And shew me, in this happy hour,
The riches of thy love.
- 3 Thou canst not always hide thy face,
Thou wilt at last my soul embrace,
Thou yet will make me clean :
My God, is there not room for me ?
I'll wait with patience, Lord, on thee,
'Till thou shalt take me in.
- 4 Remember, Lord, that Jesus bled,
That Jesus bow'd his dying head,
And sweated bloody sweat :
He bore thy wrath and curse for me
In his own body on the tree,
And more than paid my debt.
- 5 Surely he hath my pardon bought,
A perfect righteousness wrought out
His people to redeem :
O that his righteousness might be
By grace imputed now to me :
As were my sins to him.

POEM XXXVII.

- 1 THOU Sun of righteousness, arise,
Shine, glorious morning star,
Enlighten my benighted soul,
And make the Ethiop fair.
Confus'd and blind though now I am,
And prone to go astray,
Bid me receive my sight, and I Shall clearly see my way.
- 2 The captive at thy word shall be
From every chain released ;
The broken heart shall sing for joy,
The troubled sea shall rest :
Enflame me with a ray of heaven,
Pure, fervent love inspire ;
And let thy dove-like Spirit aid
And fan the holy fire.
- 3 Be thou my light, for light thou art,
O crucify each doubt ;
Sweep every corner of my heart,
And turn the tempter out :
Let not my hopes be overcast
With shadows of despair ;
Dart through my soul thy quickning beams,
And build an altar there.
- 4 Redeem me from temptations rage,
Break down the holds of sin ;
Give me to stand in crooked ways,
And keep my garments clean :
Transplant me, Saviour, from myself,
And graft me into thee ;
Then shall the grain of mustard-seed
Spring up into a tree.

POEM XXXVIII. Phil. ii. 5. Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus.

- 1 LORD, I feel a carnal mind
That hangs about me still,
Vainly though I strive to bind
My own rebellious will ;
Is not haughtiness of heart
The gulf between my God and me ?
Meek Redeemer, now impart
Thine own humility.
- 2 Fain would I my Lord pursue,
Be all my Saviour taught,
Do as Jesus bid me do,
And think as Jesus thought :
But 'tis thou must change my heart,
The perfect gift must come from thee ;
Meek Redeemer now impart
Thine own humility.
- 3 Lord, I cannot, must not, rest,
'Till I thy mind obtain,
Chase presumption from my breast,
And all thy mildness gain ;
Give me, Lord, thy gentle heart,
Thy lowly mind my portion be :
Meek Redeemer, now impart
Thine own humility.
- 4 Let thy cross my will control ;
Conform me to my guide ;
In thine image mould my soul,
And crucify my pride ;
Give me, Lord, a contrite heart,
A heart that always looks to thee :
Meek Redeemer, now impart
Thine own humility.
- 5 Tear away my ev'ry boast,
My stubborn mind abase ;
Saviour, fix my only trust
In thy redeeming grace :
Give me a submissive heart,
From pride and self-dependance free ;
Meek Redeemer, now impart
Thine own humility.

POEM XXXIX. For all the mind of Christ.

- 1 HAIL, faultless Model, sinless Guide,
In whom no blame was seen
Able thou wert, and none beside,
To ransom guilty men.
- 2 I want my happiness below in thee alone to find;
Surely thou wilt on me bestow
Thy pure, thy heav'nly mind!
- 3 Active for God I fain would be,
And do my work assigned:
Jesus, look down, implant in me,
Thy zealous fervent mind!
- While here, it was thy constant aim
To benefit mankind.
O give me, dear redeeming Lamb,
Thy loving, gracious mind!
- 5 Stiff is my neck, and proud my heart,
Unbroken, unresigned:
When wilt thou, blessed Lord, impart
Thy patient, humble mind!
- 6 My sins how slowly do I leave,
To earthly things inclin'd;
But wean me, Lord, and let me have Thy self-denying mind.
- 7 O might I walk with faithful heed,
And look no more behind,
Possess'd of what I chiefly need,
Thy serious steady mind.
- 8 Still may my ev'ry grace increase,
'Till I in heaven appear:
On earth like thee in holiness,
Like thee in glory there.

POEM XL. For Pardon.

- 1 Now, Lord, the purchased pardon give,
Nor e'er the grant revoke,
But bend my stiff obdurate neck
Beneath thine easy yoke.
- 2 O might I as a faithful sheep,
My Shepherd ne'er forsake:
O might I now for heaven set out,
And never more turn back!
- 3 Christ in his resurrection's pow'r,
Within my heart reveal:
Forgive my deep revoltings, Lord,
And my forgiveness seal.
- 4 Thou only hast the words of life,
My spirit upward draw,
Me to thy kingdom, Lord, instruct
And teach me in thy law.
- 5 Apollon waters but in vain,
Paul plants without success:
The prophets' labours fruitless are Except thou give increase.

POEM XLI. The Same.

- 1 SHOUL'D'ST thou be strict to mark our faults,
Who could acquitted be?
Who, unrenewed, could stand the search,
Or bear the scrutiny?
- 2 Lord, at thy feet I meekly fall,
Held in contrition's chain:
Thy gracious hand that cast me down,
Shall raise me up again.
- 3 O speak the word thy servant hears,
Pronounce me pardon'd now:
Lord, I believe, increase my faith,
And let me know thee too.
- 4 Thou only, Saviour, as th'e k ey,
Unlock the prison door:
Though yet I cannot fly to thee,
I'll send my heart before.

- 5 The blood of sprinkling now apply,
And that shall make me clean;
Weigh not my worthless works, O Lord,
But O, forgive my sin!
- 6 Take now away what'er obstructs
Thine intercourse with me:
And may I cheerfully leave all
I have to follow thee!

POEM XLII.

- 1 JESUS, thy pow'r I fain would feel,
Thy love is all I want:
O let thine ears consider well
The voice of my complaint.
- 2 Thou seest me yet a slave to sin,
And destitute of God;
O purify and make me clean
By thine all-cleansing blood.
- 3 Far off I stand, O bring me nigh,
And bid me sit up higher:
Immanuel, now in love pass by,
And answer my desire.
- 4 O Jesus, undertake for me,
Thy peace to me be given:
For, while I stand away from thee,
I stand away from heav'n.
- 5 I will not my offence conceal,
I will not hide my sin,
But all my crimes with weeping tell,
And own how vile I've been.
- 6 Lord, will thy wrathful jealousy
As fire for ever burn?
And wilt thou not a succour be,
And comfort those that mourn?
- 7 Reject not, Lord, my humble pray'rs,
Nor yet my soul destroy:
Thine only Son hath shown in tears
That I might reap in joy.

EUCCHARISTIC HYMNS.

"Immensa Beneficia Laudibus immensis celebranda."

PRIMA.

— O thou Patron God,
Thou God and Mortal, thence more God to Man,
Man's Theme eternal, Man's eternal Theme!
Thou canst not 'scape unjur'd from our Praise.

NIGHT THOUGHTS. NIGHT IX

HYMNS OF THANKSGIVING.

HYMN I. Praise for Conversion.

- 1 Not to myself I owe
That I, O Lord, am thine;
Free grace hath all the shades broke through,
And caus'd the light to shine.
Me thou hast willing made
Thy offers to receive;
Call'd by the voice that wakes the dead,
I come to thee and live.
- 2 Why am I made to see,
Who am by nature blind?
Why am I taken home to thee,
And others left behind?
Because thy sov'reign love
Was bent the worst to save;
Jesus, who reigns enthron'd above,
The free salvation gave.
- 3 Tho' once far off I stood,
Nor knew myself thy foe,

- Brought nigh by the Redeemer's blood,
 Myself and thee I know :
 No more a child of wrath,
 Thy smiling face I see ;
 And praise thee for the work of faith
 Which thou hast wrought in me.
- 4 With me thy Spirit strove,
 Almighty to retrieve ;
 Thou saw'st me in a time of love,
 And said unto me, Live.
 By thee made free indeed,
 I felt thy gracious words ;
 Thy mantle over me was spread,
 And I became the Lord's :
- 5 Jesus, thy Son, by grace,
 I to the end shall be ;
 Made perfect through thy comeliness
 Which I receiv'd from thee.
 I drink the living stream
 To all believers giv'n,
 A fellow citizen with them,
 Who dwell in yonder heav'n.
- 6 With all thy chosen band
 I trust to see thee there,
 And, in thy righteousness, to stand
 Undaunted at thy bar.

HYMN II. The Heavens declare the Glory of God.

- 1 The sky's a veil, the outward scene
 Proclaims the majesty within ;
 Which boundless light, tho' hid behind,
 Breaks out, too great to be confin'd.
- 2 The heav'n thy glorious impress wears,
 Thy image glitters in the stars :
 The firmament, thine high abode,
 Seems to the spangled robe of God.
- 3-Whene'er its beauty I admire,
 It's radiant globes direct me higher,
 In silent praise they point to thee,
 All light, all eye, all majesty !
- 4 Glory to Him who studs the sky,
 (Earth's variegated canopy)
 With lamps to guide us on our way,
 Faint emblems of eternal day.
- 5 Yes, Lord, each shining orb declares
 Thy name in dazzling characters ;
 As precious gems they dart their rays
 And seem to form a crown of praise.

HYMN III. On Ascension Day.

- 1 Lo ! the Lord by whom salvation
 Is to fallen man restor'd,
 Now resumes his blissful station,
 Shews himself th' Almighty Lord ;
 Slow ascending,
 Bids us, for a while, farewell.
- 2 Who his heavenly state suspended,
 And for man's atonement dy'd,
 By unnumbered hosts attended,
 Rises to his Father's side ;
 Borne by angels
 Back to his eternal throne.
- 3 Seraphs, chaunt his endless praises,
 Guard him to his ancient seat ;
 Open wide, ye heavenly places,
 Your returning God admit :
 Heav'nly portals,
 Let the King of Glory in !
- 4 Christ his kingdom re-inherits,
 His before the world began ;
 Myriads of admiring spirits
 Hover round the Son of man
 Wrapt in wonder
 View the wounds he bore for us.

- 5 " Worthy thou of exaltation,"
 Lost in sweet surprise they sing ;
 " Mortals, with like acclamation,
 Hail your great redeeming King :
 Let your voices
 Emulate th' angelic choir."
- 6 Yes, O Christ, from ev'ry creature,
 Praise shall to thy name be giv'n ;
 Worthy thou of more and greater,
 King of saints and king of heav'n !
 Kindling transports
 Swell our hearts and tune our tongues :
- 7 Though our Lord is taken from us,
 Present but in Spirit now,
 This his faithful word of promise
 Made while sojourning below ;
 " Where I enter,
 Thither shall my servant come."
- 8 Him we praise for his ascension,
 Conqueror of sin and death ;
 Gone up to prepare a mansion
 For his ransom'd flock beneath :
 They shall quickly
 Reign with him in glory there.
- 9 There already is our treasure,
 There our heart, our hope, our crown ;
 Thence on sublunary pleasure,
 We with holy scorn look down :
 Earth hath nothing
 Worth a moment's transient thought.
- 10 We shall soon in bliss adore thee,
 Gain the realms of endless day ;
 Soon be gather'd home to glory,
 All our tears be wip'd away :
 There, for ever,
 Sing the Lamb's new song of love.

HYMN IV. To the Trinity.

- 1 GLORIOUS union, God unsought ;
 Three in name and one in thought,
 All thy works thy goodness show,
 Centre of perfection thou !
- 2 Praise we, with uplifted eyes,
 Him that dwells above the skies :
 God who reigns on Sion's hill,
 Made redeem'd, and keeps us still.
- 3 Join th' angelic hosts above
 Praise the Father's matchless love,
 Who for us his Son hath giv'n,
 Sent him to regain our heav'n.
- 4 Glory to the Saviour's grace,
 Help of Adam's helpless race ;
 Who, for our transgressions slain,
 Make us one with God agains.
- 5 Next the Holy Ghost we bless ;
 He makes known and seals our peace,
 Us he cleanses and makes whole,
 Quickens ev'ry dying soul.
- 6 Holy, blessed, glorious Three,
 One from all eternity,
 Makes us vessels of thy grace,
 Ever running o'er with praise.
- 7 Thee we laud with grateful song,
 Sever'd from the guilty throng,
 Ransom'd by the Son who died,
 By the Spirit sanctified.
- 8 All the persons join to raise
 Sinners to a state of grace ;
 All unite their bliss t' insure,
 In the glorious work concur.
- 9 O that we his love might taste !
 Bless us, and we shall be blest.
 Cleanse us, Lord, from sin's abuse,
 Fit us for the Master's use !

- 10 In our hearts, thy temples dwell ;
With the hope of glory fill :
Be on earth our guest divine,
Then let heav'n make us thine.

HYMN V. Another.

- 1 FATHER, Creator of mankind,
Thee we attempt to sing ;
With thy Son and Spirit join'd,
Our everlasting king ;
Us thou dost in Christ receive,
Cloth'd with Christ we come to thee :
Him thou did'st for sinners give Their substitute to be.
- 2 All our sins, dear Lamb of God,
Are for thy sake forgiv'n,
Jesus, thy restoring blood
Entitles men to heav'n :
Self-existent, Lord of all,
Uncreate with God the same,
Bought by thee, on thee we call,
Exulting in thy name.
- 3 Spirit of Jehovah, write
Thy nature on our heart,
Us unto the Lord unite,
As thou united art ;
Make us meet his face to see,
Jesus' righteousness apply :
Holy Ghost, our leader be,
And guide us to the sky.
- 4 Three in One, before thy feet
Our inmost souls we bend,
Glorious mystery, too great
For worms to comprehend :
We can ne'er, on this side death,
Bring the Deity to light ;
Reason here must yield to faith,
'Till faith is lost in sight.

HYMN VI.

- 1 JESUS, thou tried foundation stone,
From whose prevailing blood alone
Thy saints expect salvation,
My robe thou art, I feel thy grace,
And triumph in thy righteousness,
Made mine by imputation.
- 2 Exulting in thy strength I go,
My allotted work rejoice to do,
For love divine constrains me :
Supported inwardly by this,
Through ev'ry obstacle I press
While thy great arm sustains me.
- 3 By thy free grace 'till now upheld,
My future hopes on thee I build,
Nor are my hopes ill-grounded :
Thy promises are on my side,
And safe to glory, lo ! I ride,
By countless death surrounded.
- 4 Before I from the body fly,
He who forgave shall sanctify
And perfectly renew me ;
Stronger than Satan Jesus is ;
Sin shall not always wound my peace,
Nor finally subdue me.
- 5 Who wash'd me from its deadly stain,
Shall here cut short its guilty reign,
And weaken its dominion ;
From height to height my faith shall rise
Until I gain my native skies,
On love's seraphic pinion.
- 6 Unmov'd, till then, on Christ I stand,
And Satan from the Saviour's hand
In vain attempts to stir me :
On Jesus I for strength depend ;
My omnipotent redeeming friend,
Prepare my way before me.

HYMN VII.

- 1 PRaise the Lord, my joyful heart,
With the elders bear thy part :
Stand with them around the throne,
Singing praises to the Son.
- 2 Strive with them in rapture lost,
Who shall laud the Saviour most :
Join with angels to proclaim
All the mercies of the Lamb.
- 3 Praise his great humility,
Long as life remains in thee,
By thy pray'rs and praises given,
Make on earth a little heav'n.
- 4 Jesus, I the theme renew,
Endless praises are thy due :
Anthems equal to thy grace,
Saints and angels cannot raise.
- 5 I my worthless mite cast in,
Here the song of heav'n begin :
I th' eternal chorus join,
Echoing the love divine.
- 6 Ever may I worship thee,
Praise my sole employment be ;
Sing the virtues of thy blood ;
Every moment thank my God.

HYMN VIII.

- 1 MY soul with blessings unconfin'd,
Thy tender care supplies ;
Thyself the fountain head from whence
Those blessings first arise.
- 2 Let me thy gracious gifts receive
With gratitude and joy,
And in thy just and ceaseless praise,
Each thankful hour employ !

HYMN IX.

Rom. viii. 16. The Spirit itself bears Witness with our Spirit that we are the Children of Grace.

- 1 EARNest of future bliss,
Thee, Holy Ghost, we hail ;
Fountain of holiness,
Whose comforts never fail,
The cleansing gift on saints bestow'd,
The witness of their peace with God.
- 2 With our perverseness here,
How often hast thou strove,
And spar'd us year by year,
With never-ceasing love !
O set from sin our spirits free,
And make us more and more like thee.
- 3 What wondrous grace is this,
For God to dwell with men ;
Through Jesus' righteousness,
His favour we regain.
And feeble worms, by nature lost,
Are temples of the Holy Ghost !
- 4 Tho' Belial's sons would prove
That thou no Witness art,
Thanks to redeeming love,
We feel thee in our heart ;
Continue, gracious Lord, to bear
Thine inward testimony there !
- 5 By thee on earth we know,
Ourselves in Christ renew'd,
Brought by thy grace into
The family of God :
Of his adopting love the seal,
And faithful Teacher of his will.
- 6 Great Comforter, descend
In gentle breathings down,
Preserve us to the end,
That no man take our crown :

Our Guardian still vouchsafe to be
Nor suffer us to go from thee.

HYMN X. Thanksgiving for the divine faithfulness.

- 1 IMMOVABLE our hope remains,
Within the veil our anchor lies;
Jesus, who wash'd us from our stains,
Shall bear us safely to the skies.
- 2 Strong in his strength, we boldly say,
For us Immanuel shed his blood;
Who then shall tear our shield away,
Or part us from the love of God?
- 3 Can tribulation or distress,
Or persecution's fiery sword?
Can Satan rob us of our peace,
Or prove too mighty for the Lord?
- 4 Founded on Christ, secure we stand,
Sealed with his Spirit's inward seal;
We soon shall gain the promis'd land,
Triumphant o'er the pow'rs of hell.
- 5 The winds may roar, the floods may beat;
And rain impetuous descend;
Yet will he not his own forget,
But love and save them to the end.
- 6 Jesus acquits, and who condemns?
Cease, Satan, from thy fruitless strife:
Thy malice cannot reach our names,
To blot them from the book of life.
- 7 This is eternal life to know,
God and the Lamb for sinners giv'n,
Nor will the Saviour let us go,
His ransom'd citizens of heav'n.
- 8 Us to redeem his life he paid,
And will he not his purchase have?
Who can behold Immanuel bleed,
And doubt his willingness to save?
- 9 Surely the son hath made us free,
Who earth and heav'n and hell commands;
Our cause of triumph this—that we
Are graven on the Saviour's hands.
- 10 To Him who washed us in his blood,
And lifts apostate man to heav'n,
Who reconciles his sheep to God,
Be everlasting glory giv'n.

HYMN XI. On the Birth of Christ.

- 1 AMPLEST grace in thee I find,
Friend and Saviour of mankind,
Richest merit to atone
For our sins before the throne.
- 2 Born to save thy church from hell,
Once thou didst with sinners dwell;
Was to earth a prophet giv'n,
Now our Advocate in heaven.
- 3 Well might wond'ring angels cry,
"Glory be to God on high,
Peace on earth, good will to men,
Lost mankind is found again."
- 4 Join, my soul, their holy song,
Emulate the brighter throng,
Hail the everlasting word,
Welcome thy descending Lord?
- 5 Grace unequal'd! Love unknown!
Jesus lays aside his crown,
Clothes himself with flesh and blood,
Takes the manhood into God.
- 6 Harden'd rebels tho' we are,
Lo, he comes to sojourn here:
See him lie where oxen feed,
This his chamber, hay his bed!
- 7 God (O hear it with surprise!)
For a manger leaves the skies,

By assuming flesh beneath,
Render'd capable of death.

- 8 From their Maker turn'd aside,
As in Adam all have died,
So whoe'er his grace receive
Shall in Christ be made alive.

HYMN XII. Thanksgiving for general Mercies.

- 1 GRACIOUS Creator, thy kind hand
In all thy works I see;
Resistless pow'r and midstest love
Are blended, Lord, in thee.
- 2 When thou art wrath and hid'st thy face,
The whole creation mourns;
Thou art the attractive pole to which
Thy ransom'd people turns.
- 3 O let my heart be wholly thine,
Thy property alone!
No longer let me think it mine,
Or call myself my own!
- 4 Without reserve I quit the claim,
And give up all to thee,
For thou, my all-sufficient Lord,
Art more than all to me.
- 5 Only do thou refine my dross,
And cleanse me with thy blood,
To make th' imperfect sacrifice
Acceptable to God.
- 6 Nor shall I fear, if Jesus pleads,
Unworthy as I am,
Being excluded from the feast
And supper of the Lamb.

HYMN XIII. Thanksgiving for the Righteousness of Christ.

- 1 FOUNTAIN of never-ceasing grace,
Thy saints' exhaustless theme,
Great object of immortal praise,
Essentially supreme;
We bless thee for the glorious fruits
Thy incarnation gives:
The righteousness which grace imputes,
And faith alone receives.
- 2 Whom heaven's angelic host adores,
Was slaughter'd for our sin;
The guilt, O Lord, was wholly ours,
The punishment was thine:
Our God in flesh, to set us free,
Was manifested here;
And meekly bare our sins, that
His righteousness might wear.
- 3 Imputatively guilty then
Our substitute was made,
That we the blessings might obtain
For which his blood was shed:
Himself he offer'd on the cross,
Our sorrows to remove;
And all he suffer'd was for us,
And all he did was love.
- 4 In him we have a righteousness,
By God himself approv'd
Our rock, our sure foundation this,
Which never can be mov'd,
Our ransom by his death he paid,
For all his people giv'n,
The law he perfectly obey'd,
That they might enter heav'n.
- 5 As all, when Adam sinn'd alone,
In his transgression died,
So by the righteousness of one,
Are sinners justify'd,
We to thy merit, gracious Lord,
With humblest joy submit,
Again to Paradise restor'd,
In thee alone complete.

- 6 Our souls his watchful love retrieves,
Nor lets them go astray,
His righteousness to us he gives,
And takes our sins away :
We claim salvation in his right,
Adopted and forgiv'n,
His merit is our robe of light,
His death the gate of heav'n.

HYMN XIV. Thanksgiving for the Sufferings of Christ.

- 1 O THOU who didst thy glory leave
Apostate sinners to retrieve
From nature's deadly fall ;
Me thou hast purchased with a price,
Nor shall my crimes in judgment rise,
For thou hast borne them all.
- 2 Jesus was punished in my stead,
Without the gate my Surety bled,
To expiate my stain ;
On earth the Godhead deign'd to dwell,
And made of infinite avail,
The sufferings of the man.
- 3 And was he for his rebels giv'n ?
He was : th' incarnate King of heav'n ?
Did for his foes expire ;
Amaz'd, O earth, the tidings hear
He bore, that we might never bear,
His Father's righteous ire.
- 4 Ye saints, the man of sorrows bless,
The God for your unrighteousness
Deputed to atone :
Praise him till, with the heav'nly throng,
Ye sing the never-ending song,
And see him on his throne.

HYMN XV. The General Thanksgiving in the Liturgy paraphrased.

- 1 ETERNAL God, the thanks receive,
Which thine unworthy servants give ;
Father of ev'ry mercy thou,
Almighty and all gracious too !
- 2 In humble yet exulting songs,
Thy praises issue from our tongues,
For that incessant boundless love,
Which we and all thy creatures prove.
- 3 Fashion'd by thy creating hand,
And by thy providence sustain'd,
We wish our gratitude to shew,
For all thy temporal blessings due.
- 4 But O ! for this we chiefly raise
The incense of admiring praise—
Thy love unspeakably we own
Which sent the willing Saviour down.
- 5 For him, of all thy gifts the best,
Th' exceeding gift which crowns the rest,
Chiefly for him thy name we laud,
And thank thee for a bleeding God.
- 6 Nor should we fail our Lord to praise,
For all the assisting means of grace ;
Th' appointed channels which convey Strength to support us on our way.
- 7 To thee let all our thanks be giv'n,
For our well-grounded hope of heav'n,
Our glorious trust, that we shall reign
And live with him who died for man.
- 8 And O ! so deep a sense impress
Of thy supreme, unbounded grace,
That anthems in full choir may rise,
And shake the earth and rend the skies !
- 9 Make us in deed, as well as word,
Shew forth the praises of the Lord,
And thank him still for what he gives
Both with our lips, and in our lives !

- 10 O that, by sin no more subdu'd,
We might devote ourselves to God,
And only breathe to tell his praise,
And in his service spend our days !
- 11 Hail, Father ! Hail, eternal Son !
Hail, sacred Spirit, Three in One !
Blessing and thanks, and pow'r divine,
Thrice, holy Lord, be ever thine !

PARAPHRASES

ON

SELECT PARTS OF HOLY WRIT.

Sanctos usque recludere Fontes.

PARA. I. Psalm CXLVIII.

- 1 GEN'RAL praise to God be giv'n ;
Praise him in the height of heav'n :
Him, ye glorious hosts, proclaim,
Saints and angels, bless his name !
- 2 Sun his lofty praise display,
His who made thee king of day :
Moon, adore the God of light,
God, who made thee queen of night.
- 3 Stars, your tribute too be giv'n,
Spangles in the robe of heaven :
God, your awful sovereign own,
Bright forerunner of the morn.
- 4 Praise, thou curtain of the sky,
(Hiding heav'n from mortal eye)
Him that spreads thy wat'ry clouds,
Celebrate the God of gods.
- 5 Highest heav'n, his dwelling place,
Lift thy voice, redouble his praise.
Hymn " the dweller ev'ry where,"
Present more supremely there.
- 6 Sun, and moon, and stars, and light,
Heav'n and sky, and clouds unite :
Verbal creatures of the Lord,
Swift existing at his word.
- 7 'Stablish'd firm by his command,
Lo, immovable we stand ;
Him, th' ineffable adore,
Own his regulating pow'r.
- 8 Womb and sepulchre of man,
Join, O earth, the grateful train :
Praise, 'till in the last great fire,
Thou and all thy works expire.
- 9 Ocean, with thy numerous brood,
Swell to magnify thy God :
Roll his praise from shore to shore,
Lift his name and sound his pow'r.
- 10 Praise him, fire, and hail, and snow,
Praise him, all ye winds that blow :
Cold and heat—let each extreme
Join to render praise to him.
- 11 Storms dispensing waste and death,
Dreadful messengers of wrath ;
Spread his fear and praise abroad,
Weapons of an angry God.
- 12 Mountains, vales, and hills, and trees,
Tell how good your Maker is ;
His exalted praise declare,
Feather'd songsters of the air.
- 13 Beasts of prey, where'er ye prowl,
Join to make the concert full :
Cattle, low Jehovah's fame ;
Meanest insects do the same.

14 Kings and people, rich and poor,
Celebrate creating pow'r;
Who are ransom'd by the Lamb,
Join to praise the great I AM.

15 Female, male, of every age,
From the suckling to the sage,
All conspire with one accord,
Chaut the glories of the Lord.

16 Worthy praise can ne'er be giv'n,
'Till his saints arrive at heav'n,
There, with all the glorious ones,
Sing his praise and cast their crowns.

PARA. II. Names of Christ, expressive of his Offices, taken from various parts of Scripture.

1 Low at thy feet, O Christ, we fall,
Enabled to confess,
And call thee by the Holy Ghost,
The Lord our Righteousness.

2 God over all Immanuel reigns,
With his great Father one:
The brightness of his glory thou,
And partner of his throne.

3 Author and Finisher of faith,
In all that know thy name,
A lion to thy stubborn foes,
But to thy friends a lamb.

4 Sceptre of Israel, Prince of peace,
Immortal King of kings:
The Sun of Righteousness, that shines
With healing in his wings.

5 The gift of God to fallen man,
The Lord of quick and dead:
A well of life to fainting souls,
And their sustaining bread.

6 Foundation of thy people's joy,
Their pardon and their rest:
On earth our sacrifice for sin,
In heav'n our great High Priest.

7 The Lord of life who suffer'd death
That we might heav'n regain;
The source of blessing, who on earth,
Was made a curse for man.

8 Was poor that Adam's needy sons
Treasure in thee might find;
Repairer of the dreadful breach,
Restorer of mankind.

9 Through thy desert a fallen race
To God may gain access;
With thy fine linen deck our souls,
Thy perfect righteousness.

10 With that celestial robe endued,
We ev'ry foe defy;
On earth it shall our armour be,
Our glory in the sky.

PARA. III. The Prayer of King Manasses paraphrased.

1 AUTHOR of all in earth and sky,
From whom the stars derive their light,
When thou art wroth the planets die,
And melt as nothing in thy sight.

2 Measur'd by thine Almighty hand,
Unfathom'd seas of liquid glass
Obedient, own thy high command,
And keep the bounds they cannot pass.

3 Shut up by their restraining Lord
'They in their proper channels flow:
Obey Jehovah's sovereign word,
'Here, and no farther, shall ye go.'

4 Thy terrors, as a blazing flame,
Devour and weigh the sinner down:
The mighty tremble at thy name,
And nations quake beneath thy frown.

5 Tremendous as thy judgments are,
Thy pity too no limit knows;
Thine arm is stretch'd the meek to spare,
And terribly consume thy foes.

6 With shame, great God, I own with me,
Thy waiting mercy long hath borne,
Yet would I not come back to thee,
Proudly refusing to return.

7 When mercy call'd, I stopp'd my ear,
How did I from the Saviour rove,
And, bent on death, refuse to hear
The voice of thy inviting love!

8 Blind were my eyes, and hard my heart,
And proof against thy striving grace:
I would from thee, my strength, depart,
And cease to walk in wisdom's ways.

9 But lo! on thee I fix my hope;
Be thou my friend and Advocate;
Gracious Redeemer, lift me up,
And raise me to my first estate.

10 Faith in thy merit is thy gift
By which thou dost backsliders heal:
Impart it, gracious Lord, to lift
My abject soul from whence I fell.

11 Destruction shall not seize the just,
Whose sin already is forgiv'n,
Whom thou hast rescu'd from the lost,
And number'd with the heirs of heav'n.

12 To sinners, of whom I am chief,
Thy healing promises pertain;
Who fell from thee through unbelief,
By faith may be restor'd again.

13 Of boundless mercy I have need,
My sins have took deep hold on me;
In number they the grains exceed
That form the margin of the sea.

14 Meek on the earth thy servant lies,
And humbly makes his sorrows known:
Unworthy to lift up my eyes
To heaven, my injur'd Maker's throne.

15 Bow'd with my sense of sin, I faint,
Beneath the complicated load;
Father, attend my deep complaint,
I am thy creature, thou my God!

16 Tho' I have broke thy righteous law,
Yet with me let thy Spirit stay;
Thyself from me do not withdraw,
Nor take my spark of hope away.

17 Mercy unlimited is thine,
God of the Penitent thou art;
The saving power of blood divine,
Shall wipe the anguish from my heart.

18 Then let not sin my ruin be,
Give me in thee my rest to find:
Jesus, the sick have need of thee,
The great Physician of mankind.

19 In my salvation, Lord, display
The triumphs of abounding grace:
Tell me my guilt is done away,
And turn my mourning into praise.

20 Repriev'd so long from hell's abyss,
Thou wilt not hurl me there at last,
But cheer me with the smile of peace,
Nor look at my offences past.

21 Then shall I add my feeble song
To theirs who chaunt thy praise on high,
And spread, with an immortal tongue,
Thy glory through the echoing sky.

PARA. IV. The xxth Psalm.

1 BELOV'D of God, may Jesus hear
The ardent breathings of thy pray'r,
And cancel thy transgressions;

- Be with thee in affliction's day,
 Redeem thee from thy fears, and say
 Amen to thy petitions!
 Thy ev'ry need he will supply;
 His saints shall surely find him nigh,
 The God whom they rely on;
 He will not turn away his face,
 But save thee from his holy place,
 And send thee help from Sion.
- 3 Thy feeblest pray'r shall reach his throne,
 Thy ev'ry pang is noted down,
 And thou shall be forgiv'n;
 He loves thee, troubled as thou art;
 And all the pantings of thy heart
 Are treasured up in heav'n.
- 4 God is our triumph in distress;
 His children's privilege it is
 To smile at tribulation:
 Jesus, to thee we lift our voice,
 By grace enabled to rejoice,
 In hope of thy salvation.
- 5 Ready to hear, O Lord, thou art,
 Mighty to take thy people's part,
 And help them in affliction:
 Creation kneels to thy command,
 The saving strength of thy right hand,
 Shall be our sure protection.
- 6 In chariots some repose their trust,
 Of horses others make their boast,
 But we in God are stronger:
 Who on the arm of flesh rely,
 Trembling before our face shall fly
 When we shall more than conquer.
- 7 Still may the palm to us be giv'n,
 Thy saints, O mighty King of heav'n,
 Continue to deliver:
 Support us with thy strength'ning grace,
 'Till we, in yon celestial place,
 Sit down with thee for ever.

PARA. V. Psalm cxix. Verse 169, to the end.

- 1 CONSIDER, Lord, my just complaint,
 Wisdom divine is what I want;
 From lack of knowledge, Lord, I groan:
 O when shall I my God put on?
- 2 O let my supplication rise,
 As fumes of incense to the skies,
 Enter Jehovah's high abode,
 The presence chamber of my God.
- 3 When I am truly taught thy ways,
 My lips shall only speak thy praise;
 My tongue shall sing of thee alone,
 And tell the wonders thou hast done.
- 4 Assist me in thy love to stand,
 And hold me by thy guardian hand:
 Help me to choose the lot of grace,
 The way of life, the path of peace.
- 5 Lord, I have long'd thy will to know,
 And, knowing, all thy will to do:
 My meat and drink is thee to please,
 And know the Saviour as he is.
- 6 Tho' as a sheep I went astray,
 And wander'd from thy holy way:
 The way that Christ my master trod,
 The narrow way that leads to God:
- 7 Sought out by grace, brought back I am,
 Sav'd by the merits of the Lamb,
 And now, O Christ, myself I see,
 nAdam lost, restor'd to thee.

PARA. VI. The cxxist Psalm.

- 1 My heart, when'er I lift my eyes
 To heaven's exalted sphere,
 Wing'd with impetuous ardour flies,
 To meet thee in the air.

- 2 Jesus, by faith I ever see,
 Who for the sinner pleads,
 And every moment look to thee,
 From whom my help proceeds.
- 3 The great Artificer of heav'n,
 My guard and keeper is,
 Who, by his Spirit inly giv'n,
 Assures me I am his.
- 4 Where'er I go he guides my steps,
 Nor suffers me to fall:
 Israel's defence, who never sleeps,
 Surrounds me as a wall.
- 5 In my Redeemer's watchful sight,
 Secure I ever stand;
 My guard by day, my screen by night,
 My shield on either hand.
- 6 Knit to my condescending God,
 I dwell with the Supreme;
 Nor open force nor secret fraud,
 Shall sever me from him.
- 7 His light, his peace, his heav'n is mine,
 And mine his mighty pow'r;
 My faithful centinel divine,
 Preserves me ev'ry hour.

PARA. VII. The cxxxivth Psalm.

- 1 YE friends and followers of God,
 With robes made white in Jesus' blood,
 Approach the throne of grace:
 His temple's hallow'd court draw nigh,
 By day and night renew the cry,
 And sound the trump of praise.
- 2 With ardour lift your hearts and hands;
 In yonder heav'n Immanuel stands
 To offer up your pray'rs:
 From Sion he your souls shall bless;
 Builder of heav'n and earth he is,
 And dwells above the stars.

PARA. VIII. The ivth Chapter of Amos.

- 1 YE Kine of Bashan, who devour
 The needy, and oppress the poor,
 Who drown in wine your ev'ry sense,
 And drink the spoil of violence,
- 2 God by his holiness hath sworn
 (The awful God whose law ye scorn)
 Your foes, whom more than him ye dread,
 Your destined borders shall invade.
- 3 The Lord hath ratify'd your doom,
 Yourselves and yours he will consume.
 Aliens his instrument shall be
 To scourge your vile idolatry.
- 4 Your stately buildings then shall fall;
 His vengeance shall destroy them all.
 Your palaces shall be a prey,
 And stalls for oxen in that day.
- 5 Shall guilty hands and wanton eyes
 Be lifted up in sacrifice?
 Cease to transgress, and then my ear
 Shall meet the incense of your pray'r.
- 6 In vain my judgments are abroad,
 Tokens of an offended God;
 Nor wrath nor mercies can prevail,
 Nor love of heav'n, nor fear of hell.
- 7 I gave you in your greatest need,
 Cleanness of teeth through want of bread;
 Each face was pale, and weak each knee,
 Yet have ye not returned to me.
- 8 Have I not marr'd the rip'ning grain
 With scorching heat and want of rain?
 And frustrated your rising hopes,
 By wither'd trees and blasted crops?
- 9 Your water fail'd, your wells were dry,
 Your thirst ye could not satisfy;

Your fainting cities yet sinned on,
And drew my fiercer judgments down.

- 10 Your figs and olive trees I smote,
Your vineyards I consumed with drought;
Mildew and palmer-worms bereft
The earth of what the drought had left.
- 11 Contagious sickness next I sent :
(Infatuate Egypt's punishment)
My fury next in blood I pour'd,
And gave your children to the sword.
- 12 Horses (the ruin who can tell ?)
Promiscuous with their riders fell :
Caus'd by their stench, the infectious air
Increas'd the havoc of the war.
- 13 Obdurate, still, ye felt mine ire
Reveal'd from heav'n in flames of re;
The blazing ruin swept away
Men, towns and cities in a day :
- 14 Hear then the message of the Lord,
The awful thunder of his word :
Since all my judgments strive in vain,
To kindle fear in stubborn man,
- 15 Myself in judgment shall appear,
And call thee, Israel, to my bar :
As harden'd Pharaoh, blind and proud,
Prepare to meet thy hostile God.
- 16 Prepare to meet your dreadful foe,
Omniscient and Almighty too;
Whose terrors heaven and earth proclaim,
The God of glory is his name.

PARA. IX. Psalm cxi. Verses 161—164, &c. to the 169th.

- 1 PRINCES have persecuted me,
But, Lord, my trust is still in thee ;
Me from my hope they sought to move
But could not stir me from thy love.
- 2 I fly for refuge to my Lord,
For comfort to his healing word :
From Saul my safe retreat he is,
And all the troublers of my peace.
- 3 Each passing hour displays his care ;
He saves me from the latent snare :
His love with wonder I survey,
And praise him seven times a day.
- 4 Jesus, my mind from earth withdraw
Great peace have they that love thy law :
No precept there which thou hast giv'n
Is hard to them who strive for heav'n.
- 5 I too have look'd thy health to see,
And taste the peace that comes from thee :
Each inward lust have strove to kill,
And walk in all thy perfect will.
- 6 My soul hath lov'd thy ways and thee,
Thy word is life and health to me :
Exceedingly thy word I prize,
The fund where heavenly treasure lies.
- 7 Thy testimonies are my food,
The saving oracles of God :
Studious of them on earth I'll be,
And then fly up to reign with thee.

PARA. X. Salvation recovered for man by Jesus Christ. Isaiah iii. 1—3. 9—11. 15.

- 1 ZION, awake, put on thy strength,
Resume thy beautiful array :
The promis'd Saviour comes at length,
To chase thy guilt and grief away :
Thee for his purchase God shall own,
And save thee by his dying Son.
- 2 Jerusalem, be holy now,
Satan no more shall dwell in thee ;
Wash'd from thy sin, and white as snow,
Prepare thy God-made-man to see ;

Prepare Immanuel to behold
And hear his peaceful message told.

- 3 Shake off the dust, arise with speed,
Too long hast thou a captive been ;
Redemption's near, lift up thine head,
And cast away the chains of sin ;
Forth from thy prison come, and shake
The yoke of bondage from thy neck.
- 4 Tho' ye have sold yourselves for nought,
And forfeited your claim to heaven,
Accept the Saviour's love unbought ;
Your treason now is all forgiv'n ;
My blood the fallen race restores,
And saves without desert of yours.
- 5 Ye desert places, sing for joy ;
Lost man, your hymns of wonder raise ;
Let holy shouts invade the sky,
And ev'ry altar flame with praise ;
For I, Almighty to redeem,
Have comforted Jerusalem.
- 6 My arm's made bare for your defence,
To save my Church from Satan's power,
Depart, depart, come out from thence,
Defile yourselves with sin no more :
Be pure, ye priests, who preach my word,
And bear the vessels of the Lord.
- 7 Look out and see Immanuel come,
Myriads to sprinkle with his blood ;
He many nations shall bring home,
And save them from the wrath of God :
And earth's remotest bounds shall see
The great salvation wrought by me.

PARA. XI. The viiith Chapter of Hosea.

- 1 SET the loud trumpet to thy mouth,
Let all the final warning hear ;
My everlasting word of truth,
To high and low alike declare.
- 2 Swift as the ravenous eagle flies,
And darts impetuous on her prey,
Shall their victorious enemies
Fill Israel's land with pale dismay.
- 3 Then shall they cry to me in vain ;
Tho' ask'd with tears, no aid I'll grant,
Because they did my words disdain,
And trample on my covenant.
- 4 Me for their God they will not have,
Therefore I give them to the sword :
Your foes commission shall receive
T' avenge my quarrel, saith the Lord.
- 5 Sin is the God whom they adore,
And hell-born lusts their rulers are :
Th' apostate land shall feel my pow'r,
The fury of destructive war.
- Go, to your gods, O Israel, go !
Samaris, to thy calf apply !
Thy idols cannot help thee now,
Nor save thee when distress is nigh.
- * When wilt thou turn to me, thy God ?
When wilt thou seek my injur'd face ?
'Till then my wrath shall drench in blood
The harden'd, unbelieving race.
- 8 Ye fools and blind, consider this,
Can they be gods which hands have made ?
On you and on your images,
I'll hurl the ruin I have said.
- 9 Who sow in sin shall reap in pain ;
My word shall surely come to pass .
Unnumber'd mischiefs yet remain
For those despisers of my grace.
- 10 To punish their apostacy,
The corn shall perish ere it rise ;
Or what comes up shall only be
A portion for their enemies.

- 11 For Israel waxes worse and worse,
Nor quakes at my tremendous frown,
Famine and war unite their force,
To bring a sinful people down.
- 12 Before the heathen Israel flies,
His boasted strength is weakness found :
As from a broken vessel lies,
Slighted and useless on the ground.
- 13 Ephraim is up to Syria gone,
In all the confidence of pride :
Alas, he goes to war alone,
Jehovah is not on his side.
- 14 Ephraim in vain the King of kings
With condescending pity woo'd :
The fatal love of earthly things
Has drawn him from the love of God.
- 15 The fierce invaders to repel,
Tho' they have foreign aid obtain'd,
Yet shall the ungrateful nation feel
The weight of my avenging hand.
- 16 Since Ephraim hath disguis'd his sin
Beneath religion's specious form,
His very prayer shall be unclean,
And hasten to bring on the storm.
- 17 In vain I gave my gracious law,
The treasure of my written word ;
No beauty there the worldlings saw,
Nor priz'd the message of the Lord.
- 18 Wherefore their cry I will not hear,
Nor yet accept their sacrifice ;
Unpardon'd sin pollutes their pray'r,
Nor lets it penetrate the skies.
- 19 In Egypt they again shall weep ;
I'll visit their iniquity :
Their sins I will in mem'ry keep,
Because they have forgotten me.
- 20 In vain they fence their cities round,
In forts and ramparts put their trust :
Their lofty spires shall kiss the ground,
By light'ning levell'd with the dust.

PARA. XII. The cxxvth Psalm.

- 1 Who, Lord, confide in thee,
And in thy faith endure,
Shall as Mount Sion be,
Immoveable and sure :
As Christ their rock, unshook, unmov'd ;
Of God eternally belov'd.
- 2 The rising mountains stand
Around Jerusalem ;
So God's almighty hand,
Guards us who trust in him :
We never will of safety doubt,
While he shall compass us about.
- 3 Ye souls who stand in God,
Whom Jesus' blood hath bought,
The guilty sinner's rod
Shall never be your lot :
Ye shall not fall, upheld by grace,
Nor put your hands to wickedness.
- 4 The upright men in heart
Jehovah will defend ;
Will not from them depart,
But love them to the end :
He will do well, O saints, to you,
The Lord will never let you go.
- 5 But such as will forsake
The happy path of peace,
Deceivers, that turn back
To their own wickedness,
The double wrath of God shall feel,
And sink unpardon'd into hell.
- 6 While they who hear his call,
And plead a Saviour's blood,

Shall reign in joy with all
The ransom'd ones of God
Peace upon Israel shall come,
To endless glory gather'd home.

PARA. XIII. Lord's Prayer. Matthew vi. 9—13.

- 1 Our holy Father, all thy will
We fain would perfectly fulfil ;
But each has left thy law undone,
Unworthy to be call'd thy Son.
- 2 Who art in heaven, enthron'd on high
Diffusing glory through the sky ;
Reigning above, on earth rever'd,
By saints belov'd, by sinners fear'd.
- 3 For ever hallow'd be thy name,
The Triune God, the bright I AM ;
At which seraphic choirs and all
The hosts of heaven adoring fall.
- 4 Thy kingdom come ; e'en now we wait
Thy glory to participate :
Rule in our hearts, unrivall'd reign,
Nor e'er withdraw thyself again.
- 5 Thy will, thy law, thy precept giv'n,
Be done on earth, as 'tis in heaven :
Faithful as Angels, fain would we
With cover'd faces wait on thee.
- 6 Great God, on whom the ravens cry
For sustenance, our wants supply :
Give us this day, and evermore,
Our daily bread from hour to hour.
- 7 Forgive whate'er we do amiss,
Our wilful sins and trespasses,
As we forgive (reward us thus)
All them that trespass against us.
- 8 And lead us not by bounty's tide,
Into temptation, lust or pride :
But what by mercy we obtain,
Let pow'r omnipotent restrain.
- 9 And O ! deliver us thine own
From evil and the evil one,
Who fain his darts in us would sheath,
And bind us with the chains of death.
- 10 Thou, Lord, can'st vanquish his design,
Thine is the kingdom, only thine ;
The pow'r, th' eternal majesty,
And glory, appertain to thee !

PARA. XIV. Psalm lxxiii.

- 1 O God, my God thou art,
My Father too by grace ;
I dare not from my hope depart,
Or cease to seek thy face :
My thirsty spirit pants
Thy plenitude to prove,
And comprehend with all thy saints,
The fulness of thy love.
- 2 In this dry, barren land,
Where water is not found,
I fain would fly to thy right hand,
Where living streams abound :
Thee, thee, I long to know,
A thirst for God I am,
And come to thee as needy now
As when at first I came.
- 3 Thy glory and thy pow'r
I long again to see,
To have again, as heretofore,
Sweet fellowship with thee ;
Again to feel thy peace,
Again thy name to praise :
Better than life thy favour is,
To all that know thy grace.
- 4 With persevering hope,
Thy mercy I'll proclaim,

My hands in steady faith lift up,
And magnify thy name.
Thy praises I'll reveal,
'Till I from earth remove,
My mouth with joyful lips shall tell
The wonders of thy love.

8 Surely I reason have
On thee, my God, to trust;
My life thou liftest from the grave,
My spirit from the dust:
Thy grace and boundless might
My theme by day shall be,
My glory in the silent night,
To meditate on thee.

6 My succour thou hast been
When ev'ry helper failed,
Or I, ere now, had fell by sin,
And Satan had prevail'd;
My soul, redeem'd from death,
To thee her offering brings,
And hides her helpless head beneath
The covert of thy wings.

7 Thou keep'st my steady feet
In thy appointed road;
By all the pow'rs of hell beset,
I follow after God:
In Jesus I am safe,
My castle of resort;
His hand is both my shield and staff,
My shelter and support.

8 The men who seek to tread
Thy faithful people down,
And persecute, in them, their Head,
And crucify their Son,
Thou, Lord, will surely foil
In thy avenging day,
And give their bodies for a spoil
To ev'ry beast of prey.

9 But me, and all who love
Thy worship and thy ways,
Thou far from danger wilt remove,
And hide us in thy place:
Who speak the words of truth,
Thou, Lord, on them shall smile,
But thou wilt stop the liar's mouth,
And slay the sons of guile.

PARA XV. Psalm cxix. From the 40th Verse to the 49th.

1 LET thy loving mercy, Lord,
Come also unto me;
Now according to thy word,
My present Saviour be:
Unbelievers then no more
Shall against my hope blaspheme;
For'd to own, "The mighty pow'r
Of God hath rescu'd him."

2 In thy word my trust I place,
And humbly urge my claim,
'Till I of thy saving grace,
A living witness am:
Give me, Lord, thyself to know,
Then in me thy word fulfil,
To walk in all things here below,
According to thy will.

3 Seeking now in steadfast faith,
I wait a word from thee;
Bring my feet into the path
Of perfect liberty;
Then, when I the path have found,
Un-asham'd thy truth I'll shew:
Kings shall hear the joyful sound,
And seek salvation too.

4 My delight is in thy word
Which I have lov'd of old,

Dearer is thy promise, Lord,
To me than mines of gold:
Up to thee my hands I lift,
'Till I of thy grace receive;
Give the never changing gift,
Thy full redemption give.

OCCASIONAL PIECES

ON THE

DEATH OF FRIENDS.

John xi. 26. Whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die.

——— *Quid sibi saxa cavata,
Quid palchra volant monumenta,
Nisi quod res creditor illis
Non mortua, sed data somno?*

PRUD

EPITAPH I. ON MRS. E. B.

IF candour, merit, sense, or virtue dies,
Reader, beneath thy feet dead virtue lies;
Yet still she lives, if worth can eternize.
Lives far above the reach of death: But where?
In heav'n, and ev'ry heart that knew her here.
Vain are encomiums; praise is idly spent
On them whose actions are their monument.
Thrice sacred tomb, be loyal to thy trust,
And guard, till Christ revives her hallow'd dust
Then, as a faithful steward, safe restore
The precious treasure thou must kept no more.

EPITAPH II. ON MR. G. WALTON.

1 THE debt of nature I have paid,
Which thou must shortly pay:
To learn instruction from the dead,
Thou breathing taper, stay.
2 Swifter than thought thy years depart,
My verse proclaims their haste:
A moment nearer death thou art,
Than when you read the last.
3 Soon must thy earth to earth be giv'n,
Soon must thou disappear:
Say, reader, is thy heart in heav'n,
And is thy treasure there?
4 Like thee the prostrate dead I view'd,
While in the flesh detain'd:
How differ we? thou 'rt on the road,
I've reach'd my journey's end.

EPITAPH III. ON THE DEATH OF MRS. F. T.

June 3, 1754. Heb. iv. 9. There remaineth therefore a rest for the people of God.

1 THE robes of light our sister wears,
Which emulate the sun,
Should cause us to suspend our tears,
And make our anthems rival theirs
Who stand before the throne.
2 Glory to Him whose love constrains,
And saves us by his blood:
By virtue of his dying pains,
She finds the rest that still remains,
For ev'ry child of God.
3 In fiery trials day by day
Unshaken did she stand;
To glory sweetly made her way,
Meek and resign'd as passive clay,
In her great potter's hand.
4 Her woes their period have found,
They cannot now enslave,

- Nor come where endless joys abound,
Nor haunt her peaceful soul beyond
The limit of the grave.
- 5 Victorious she assumes the wreath
For conquerors design'd,
The end of persevering faith ;
And leaves her cares releas'd by death,
Eternally behind.
- 6 No more by Satan's rage pursu'd,
Affliction shalt thou see ;
Secure of heav'n for thine abode,
Blest with the presence of thy God,
To all eternity.
- 7 The happy change that life deny'd,
Assisting death affords ;
Behold her at Immanuel's side,
Unutterably glorify'd,
Immutably the Lord's !
- 8 O may we too maintain our ground,
From faith to faith go on !
At the last day in Christ be found,
And form the circles that surround
His everlasting throne !

EPITAPH IV. ON THE DEATH OF MR. ENOCH
WILLIAMS, August, 1757.

Gen. v. 24. *And Enoch walked with God, he was not,
for God took him.*

- 1 HEARKEN ! the Saviour's voice at last
Invites his sufferer home,
And tells thee all thy toil is past,
But thy reward is come.
- 2 Till meet for bliss on earth detain'd,
The conquest thou hast won ;
Through much temptation thou hast gain'd,
The prize, and reach'd the crown :
- 3 While shouting angels chaunt their joys,
And tune their notes the higher,
And clap their wings, for O ! thy voice,
Is added to the choir.
- 4 Of his inheritance above
They hail a saint possess :
Made meet, by his Redeemer's love,
To be Jehovah's guest.
- 5 Swift as an arrow through the air,
The tow'ring spirit flies,
Intrusted to a seraph's care,
And convoy'd to the skies :
- 6 On the expanded wings of love,
He seeks his high abode,
To meet the happy souls above,
That are brought home to God.
- 7 Him they salute with lifted cry,
As soon as enter'd there,
" But for thy favour'd ministry,
Or we had not been here :
- 8 From pain to glory summon'd forth,
Thrice welcome from below,
Our fellow-sufferer on earth,
Our fellow angel now ! "
- 9 While humbly he draws near the throne,
The Saviour's crystal seat ;
Gives him the praise, and casts his crown
At his redeeming feet.
- 10 Lifted above the reach of pain,
We soon shall change our place ;
And join Immanuel's shining train,
And see his blissful face :
- 11 Rejoicing in that glorious hope,
We bear his cross below ;
We quickly shall be taken up,
Sublimer joys to know.
- 12 For our arrival into bliss,
Our friends in glory wait :

Cut short thy work in righteousness,
And make their joys complete !

- 13 The happy soul whom Jesus gives
In him to live and die,
Its blest transition scarce perceives
Into eternity.
- 14 A sight of him that conquer'd death,
In our last moments giv'n,
Shall elevate our languid faith,
And charm us into heav'n.
- 15 Christ when expiring Stephen view'd,
He scorn'd death's utmost pow'r,
And calmly fell asleep in God,
Amidst the stony show'r.
- 16 Assist us, Lord, to walk and live,
In Zion's heavenly road,
And then our souls to thee receive,
When call'd to meet our God.
- 17 A little while, and we shall soar
To yonder promisd land,
And meet our brethren gone before,
Enthron'd at thy right hand :
- 18 Thy praise shall actuate each tongue,
Thy love our hearts enflame ;
And we with them shall sing the song
Of Moses and the Lamb.

EPITAPH V. ON MASTER EUSTACE BATEMAN.

- 1 HAIL, happy youth, so early taken home,
Caught up to Jesus from the ill to come :
By thy Redeemer sweetly order'd hence,
Ere vice had marr'd thy lovely innocence.
- 2 When twice six winters he had scarcely seen,
His heav'n-born soul disdain'd to dwell with men :
Ardent the crown eternal to receive,
And ripe for heav'n, he only died to live.

EPITAPH VI. ON THE DEATH OF THE REV. MR. R. B.

Numbers xxiii. 10. Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.

- 1 THrice happy they who sleep in God,
Securely wafted o'er the flood,
To Canaan's peaceful shore !
Whose lives were as a daily death,
Who walk'd with God, and liv'd by faith,
And now shall die no more !
- 2 Such, gracious Lord, we wish to be ;
Such was our pastor, now with thee,
Our candlestick below .
A burning and a shining light,
He liv'd awhile to bless our sight,
But shines in glory now.
- 3 A prophet hallow'd from the womb.
To seek and bring the wand'ers home,
Anointed, set apart :
Enabled, by the searching word,
To set the message of the Lord,
Home to the sinner's heart.
- 4 His ev'ry pow'r devoted was
To further his Redeemer's cause ;
Nor did his talents hide :
A beacon set upon a hill,
He liv'd to do his Master's will ;
He did his will, and died.
- 5 A faithful messenger he stood,
The trumpet and the mouth of God,
To make his counsel known :
His life one constant voice hath been,
Inviting sinners to come in,
And ask th' eternal crown.
- 6 May I, like him, my hours employ,
Finish, like him, my course with joy,
And sleep to wake in bliss !

Like him be number'd with the blest !
 Jesus regard my one request,
 Make my last end like his.

EPITAPH VII. ON THE DEATH OF MR. R. V.

Heb. vi. 12. Be not slothful, but followers of them who, through faith and patience, inherit the promises.

- 1 THE crown of righteousness is giv'n,
 Our friend is landed safe in heaven :
 His warfare now accomplish'd is,
 And face to face his Lord he sees.
- 2 For ever now redeemed from pain,
 He did not run nor strive in vain ;
 With triumph from his clay releas'd,
 Translated to his place of rest.
- 3 Ear hath not heard, nor eye beheld,
 What to the saints is there reveal'd ;
 Blissful experience only knows
 The glories of the upper house.
- 4 Far, far from all distress remov'd,
 They know the God whom here they lov'd :
 Temptation, sickness, grief and care,
 Shall never gain admission there.
- 5 Then let us seek, in steadfast faith,
 A city that foundations hath :
 Our bright immoveable abode,
 Whose glorious architect is God.
- 6 There we shall all our pain forget,
 And only songs of praise repeat ;
 In knowledge, happiness, and love,
 To all eternity improve.
- 7 There we shall as the angels shine,
 The martyrs' noble army join ;
 And see the Lamb (thrice blissful sight !)
 Encompass'd with his saints in light.
- 8 When shall we to our joy be giv'n :
 O, when exchange this earth for heav'n ?
 And cast our crowns before the throne,
 And worship him that sits thereon ?
- 9 When shall we hear th' inviting word,
 And be for ever with the Lord ?
 A day with Christ in glory there,
 Is better than a thousand here.
- 10 Holy and true, call in thine own,
 Accomplish, Lord, their number soon :
 Us to thy second coming seal,
 And with thyself for ever fill !

AN

APPENDIX,

CONSISTING OF SEVERAL PIECES, NOT PROPERLY
 REDUCIBLE TO ANY OF THE PRECEDING HEADS.

I.

- 1 LOOK back, my soul, and take a view
 Of Christ expiring on the tree :
 Behold thy Saviour breathe his last
 To buy eternal life for thee !
 Thy Jesus faints,—'Tis finished, cries,
 Reclines his sacred head, and dies.
- 2 Shadows and types are done away,
 The temple's veil is rent in twain :
 Vanish, ye emblematic rights,
 The real victim now is slain ;
 Is slain for sinners to atone,
 The priest and sacrifice in one.
- 3 Methinks I see the purpled earth,
 Startle to feel its Maker's blood ;
 The sun retires, and from their graves,
 Saints rise to hail their dying Lord :

Each sympathising rock appears
 More tender than his murderers.

- 4 And did the Saviour thus exchange
 His throne of glory for a cross ?
 Left he for this th' ethereal court
 To die a painful death for us ?
 For us he bled at ev'ry vein,
 And, slain by man, for man was slain.
- 5 Obdurate heart, shall mountains heave,
 And nature mourn her best beloved,
 Shall the rocks tremble at his voice,
 And I alone abide unmov'd !
 Shall I not weep his death to see,
 Who wept in tears of blood for me ?
- 6 O, Prince of martyrs, touch my heart,
 There at thy mighty standard rest ;
 Burn purifying incense there,
 Fit it for so divine a guest :
 There let thy pow'ful cross reside,
 'Till every lust is crucified.

II. To a friend who asked what God is.

- 1 Is there a man whose daring hand
 Can number ev'ry grain of sand ?
 Can count the drops that fill the sea,
 Or tell how many stars there be ?
- 2 Who, then, shall strive to comprehend
 Infinity that knows no end ?
 Who shall set bounds to boundless pow'r,
 Restrain omnipotence, or low'r
 Eternity to one poor hour ?
- 3 Believe me, friend, thou canst not more
 The vast designs of God explore
 Than thy short arm can touch the skies,
 Or fathom ocean's deep abyss.
- 4 Who shall disclose his Maker's plan,
 Or dare his secret will to scan ?
 Shall feeble, guilty, finite man ?
- 5 None but perfection, such as his,
 Can know th' Almighty as he is ;
 His glory never can be brought
 Adapted to a mortal's thought.
- 6 Consider what thou art, and fear
 This unseen witness always near.
 Dive not into his deep decree,
 The object's too elate for thee ;
 Thou must not ask, nor wish to see.
 Cast each presumptuous doubt away ;
 Remember thou 'rt, at best, but clay,
 Whose only province is t' obey.

III. Isaiah xlix. 16. Behold, I have graven thee on the palms of my hands.

- 1 REDEEM'D offender, hail the day
 That sees thy sin forgiv'n :
 Jesus hath borne thy guilt away
 And pleads for thee in heav'n.
- 2 Imprinted on his hands thou art
 In characters of blood ;
 The stream that issu'd from his heart
 Shall waft thee safe to God.
- 3 For me vouchsaf'd the unspotted Lamb
 His Father's wrath to bear :
 I see his feet, and read my name
 Engraven deeply there.
- 4 Forth from the Lord his gushing blood
 In purple currents ran :
 And ev'ry wound proclaim'd aloud
 His wondrous love to man.
- 5 My faith looks back and sees him bleed ;
 A thorny crown he wears
 To set upon the sinner's head
 A shining crown of stars.

- 6 Saviour, I fain would take the wreath,
To thee, my centre, move,
In all the lowliness of faith,
In all the heights of love.
- 7 Thy righteousness my robe shall be,
Thy bitter death my hope:
For my offence upon the tree
My Lord was lifted up.
- 8 For me the Saviour's blood avails,
Almighty to atone:
The hands he gave to piercing nails
Shall lead me to his throne.

IV. Phil. iv 5. Be careful for nothing.

- 1 CAN my heav'n-born soul submit
To care for things below!
Nay, but never from the feet
Of Jesus may I go.
Anxious, Lord, for nothing here,
In ev'ry strait I look to thee;
Humbly cast my ev'ry care
On him that cares for me.
- 2 Godliness is greatest gain,
For that alone I pray;
Lord, I never would complain,
Give thou or take away:
Never would I grieve for ought,
So Christ is mine and I am his;
I would ne'er, by taking thought,
Obstruct my inward peace.
- 3 He shall dwell in perfect rest
Whose mind is stay'd on thee,
Whom to keep within my breast,
My only care shall be;
View the lilies of the field,
They grow, but neither toil nor spin,
By their Maker's arm upheld,
Who clothes the earth with green.
- 4 See the ravens, day by day,
Their Maker gives them food,
Lions, roaring for their prey,
Do seek their meat from God:
Lean thou on his faithful word,
Nor by distrust provoke his wrath,
Cast thy burden on the Lord,
O thou of little faith.
- 5 Will the Saviour (who thy peace
At such a price hath bought)
From his work of mercy cease,
And sell thy life for nought?
Doubting soul, to him look up,
His ears are open to thy cry;
God shall recompense thy hope,
And all thy need supply.
- 6 Thou hast promis'd help to thine
And I believe the word;
I will never ask a sign,
Nor dare to tempt the Lord:
'Tis enough for God to say,
I'll feed my people with my hand
Heav'n and earth shall pass away,
But his decree shall stand.

V. Judgment.

- 1 BEHOLD, the awful day comes on,
When Jesus on his righteous throne
Shall in the clouds appear:
With solemn pomp shall bow the sky,
And in the twinkling of an eye
Arraign us at his bar.
- 2 But first th' archangel's trump shall blow;
Our scatter'd dust its voice shall know,
And quicken at the sound;
The sea shall then give up her dead,
And nations, starting from their bed,
Shall cleave the op'ning ground.

- 3 Who shall sustain his righteous ire,
When Jesus sets the clouds on fire,
And makes the earth retreat?
In vain shall sinners then repent,
When each expiring element
Shall melt with fervent heat.
- 4 The dead in Christ shall first awake,
The faithful few, who, for his sake,
On earth were justify'd:
Guarded by a seraphic band,
Aloft they mount to his right-hand,
In whom they liv'd and died.
- 5 See next the guilty crowd arise,
Beholding, with reluctant eyes,
The glories of the Lamb,
While taunting fiends impatient wait
To hurl them from the judgment seat
To hell's eternal flame.
- 6 Hark! as they mount, by devils borne,
To meet their Judge, on earth their scorn,
Despairingly they cry,
"Fall on us, rocks, with ail your load,
And screen us from the wrath of God,
And hide us from his eye."
- 7 In vain on rocks and hills ye call,
The rocks shall from their basis fall,
And know their place no more:
The hills shall melt when God comes down,
And mountains crumble at his frown,
And groan beneath his pow'r.
- 8 What thought can paint their black despair
Who this tremendous sentence hear,
Irrevocably giv'n,
"Depart, ye cursed, into hell
With everlasting burnings dwell,
Remote from me and heav'n?"
- 9 But, O thou Saviour of mankind,
Display thy pow'r, and to the blind
Effectual light afford:
Snatch them from unbelief,
And now compel them to come in,
And tremble at thy word.
- 10 Methinks I hear thy mercy plead,
The voice of Him that wakes the dead
Doth over sinners mourn:
"Why do ye still your God forget,
And madly hasten to the pit
From whence is no return?"
- 11 "Ye reasoners, make the wisest choice
Listen in time to reason's voice,
Nor dare Almighty ire:
Turn, lest my hottest wrath ye feel,
And find, too late, the flames of hell
No metaphoric fire."

VI. Contempt of the world.

- 1 CAN ought below engross my thought?
Or am I to the world confin'd?
Nay, let my pure affections soar
To objects of a nobler kind!
- 2 I know I'm but a pilgrim here,
That seeks a better, promis'd land.
Then may I run and never tire,
Till that celestial home's obtain'd.
- 3 Resolv'd to tread the sacred way
That Jesus water'd with his blood,
I bend my fix'd and cheerful course
Through that rough path my master trod.
- 4 Contemptuous of the world I live,
A daily death rejoice to die:
And, while I move and walk below,
My absent heart mounts up on high.
- 5 O light of life, still guide my steps,
Without thy friendly aid I stray:

- Lead me, my God, for I am blind,
Direct me, and point out my way.
- 6 Let the vain world applaud or frown,
Still may I heaven's path pursue :
Still may I stand unshook, and keep
The centre of my hopes in view !
- 7 Tho' Satan, earth, and self oppose,
Yet, thro' thy help I'll persevere ;
To Canaan's hills my eyes lift up,
And choose my lot and portion there.
- 8 The way that leads to glory lies
Through ill-report, contempt, and loss :
Assist me to deny myself,
To follow thee and bear thy cross.
- 9 Let Satan never come between,
Nor separate my God from me ;
But may my soul, in ev'ry storm,
Find a sure resting place in thee.

VII.

- 1 DYING Redeemer, slaughter'd Lamb,
Thou pour'd'st out thy blood for me !
O may I, kindled by thy flame,
As freely give myself to thee !
My heart to thee I now resign,
For, Lord, it cost the blood of thine !
- 2 To save my falling soul from death,
Th' immaculate Redeemer died ;
Lord, my offences drew the nails,
The soldier I, that pierc'd thy side :
For this my restless eye runs o'er,
Because I can lament no more.
- 3 How gladly should my head have worn
The crown of thorns to hinder thine !
Have suffer'd in my master's stead,
And made thy dying sorrows mine !
Have stretch'd my arms upon the tree,
And died myself to rescue thee.
- 4 But O ! no other sacrifice,
The Father's justice could appease ;
Ten thousand worlds had died in vain,
Thy blood alone could buy our peace :
The God offended must be slain,
To expiate the offence of man.
- 5 And shall I not his cross take up
Who died upon a cross for me ?
Jesus, through good and ill report,
I, in thy strength, will follow thee.
My master liv'd despis'd, abhorr'd,
And I am not above my Lord.

VIII.

Life and Immortality brought to light by the Gospel.

- 1 How blest am I ! no snare I fear,
While Jesus keeps his dwelling here :
His presence chases death away,
Enliv'n'ing with continual day.
- 2 By Satan's rage I stand unshook,
My hopes are founded on a rock :
Christ is the stone on which I build,
My castle, guardian, helmet, shield !

IX.

To the Rev. Mr. E. W. March, 1757.

- 1 SOLDIER of the living God,
Steward of the mystic word,
Use the gifts on thee bestow'd
To the honour of thy Lord.
Free thou didst from him receive,
Man of God as freely give.
- 2 Clad with zeal as with a cloak,
Boldly urge thy rapid way ;
Firmly grounded as a rock,
Faithful in the trying day :

Stand in Christ thy sure abode,
Safely hid with him in God.

- 3 In Immanuel's strength go forth,
Loud his dying love proclaim,
Dare the feeble sons of earth,
Conquer in his saving name :
March with Jesus for thy guide,
Go, for God is on thy side !
- 4 Bear the standard of the Lord,
Fight thy captain's battles well ;
With the Spirit's two-edg'd sword,
Put to flight the hosts of hell :
Single thou thy foes shall chase,
Arm'd with all the strength of grace.
- 5 Satan and the world may join,
Hell and death with thee engage ;
Strong thou art in strength divine,
Safe amidst their blackest rage :
Jesus shall thy soul confirm,
Lift thee up above the storm.
- 6 Vainly shall the blinded crew
Strive thy progress to withstand ;
Thee they never shall subdue,
Guarded by the Saviour's hand :
God hath said concerning thee,
" As thy day thy strength shall be."
- 7 But if Jesus should depart,
For a season cease to smile,
Proving what is in thine heart,
Leave thee to thyself awhile,
He again thy stay will prove,
Bear thee in his arms of love.
- 8 When thou dost in secret pray'r
Find a ready, free access,
When thou tellest all thy care,
Sweetly at the throne of grace,
Me to Jesus then commend,
Think upon thy distant friend !
- 9 Dauntless thou his word proclaim,
Tell his message to mankind ;
Bid them, in thy master's name,
Ask the pearl for those design'd :
Tell them, Jesus will redeem
All that come to God by him.
- 10 Faithful to thy sacred trust,
Thus from strength to strength go on ;
Stay the weak, bring back the lost,
Labour 'till thy work is done :
Fight and conquer, end the strife,
Enter on eternal life.

X.

1 Thess. v. 24. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it.

- 1 FICKLE and changeable man,
Terrestrial joys are just as vain,
And perish in the tasting ;
But Jesus' truth I cannot fear,
His gifts without repentance are,
His love is everlasting.
- 2 Mercy unchangeable is his,
Eternal as himself it is,
Nor will his promise fail me :
I own the token he has given,
And steadily press on to heav'n,
Tho' fiends and men assail me.
- 3 He never will from me remove ;
For me the Saviour pleads above,
Still making intercession :
I hear his pray'r, I feel his blood,
Kept by the mighty pow'r of God,
Through faith unto salvation.
- 4 His Spirit for that end is giv'n,
To bear unhurt, unstain'd, to heav'n,
The soul of each believer :

- Deputed by the Lamb he is,
To comfort, guard, and strengthen his,
And stay with them for ever.
- 5 Through him united to the Son,
Unalienably sealed his own,
Nor earth, nor hell, shall move me :
From conquering I to conquer go ;
Jesus hath lov'd me hitherto,
And to the end will love me.
- 6 Bent to devour the serpent stands,
But Christ from his own mighty hands
Will never let him force me :
My Maker is my Husband now,
Nor heights above, nor depths below,
Shall from my Lord divorce me.
- 7 If, for a season, Satan's chain
Be lengthen'd, Jesus will sustain
Me in the sore temptation ;
Will frustrate the accuser's hope,
And bear my ransomed spirit up
Above the inundation.
- 8 His name assuredly I prove
Essential faithfulness and love :
Shall I, by doubting, grieve him ?
My soul he with a price hath bought,
His law within my heart is wrote,
And I shall never leave him.

TO THE

HOLY SPIRIT,

MODERNIZED FROM THE OFFICE FOR ORDINATION.

HYMN I. To the Holy Spirit, &c.

- 1 COME, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire,
And warm with uncreated fire !
Thou the anointing Spirit art,
Who dost thy sevenfold gift impart :
Thy blessed unction from above
Is comfort, life, and fire of love.
- 2 Enable with perpetual light
The dulness of our blinded sight ;
Anoint and cheer us all our days,
With the abundance of thy grace :
Our foes convert, give peace at home ;
Where thou art guide, no ill can come.
- 3 Teach us to know the Father, Son,
And thee ; a Trinity in one :
That, thro' the ages all along,
This may be our endless song :
Praise to thy eternal love,
Father, Son, and mystic dove !

HYMN II. A contemplation, suggested by Rev. vii. 9—17.

- 1 I SAW, and lo ! a countless throng
Th' elect of ev'ry nation, name, and tongue,
Assembled round the everlasting throne ;
With robes of white endu'd
(The righteousness of God ;)
And each a palm sustain'd
In his victorious hand :
When thus the bright melodious choir begun :
" Salvation to thy name,
Eternal God, and co-eternal Lamb,
In pow'r, in glory, and in essence, one ! "
- So sang the saints, th' angelic train,
Second the anthem with a loud Amen.
(These in the outer circle stood,
The saints were nearest God ;)

- And prostrate fall, with glory overpow'r'd,
And hide their faces with their wings,
And thus address the King of kings :
" All hail, by thy triumphant Church ador'd !
Blessing, and thanks, and honour too,
Are thy supreme, thy everlasting due,
Our tri-une sovereign, our propitious Lord ! "
- While I beheld th' amazing sight,
A seraph pointed to the saints in white,
And told me who they were, and whence they came :
" These are they, whose lot below
Was persecution, pain, and woe :
These are the chosen, purchas'd flock,
Who ne'er their Lord forsook ;
Through his imputed merit, free from blame ;
Redeem'd from ev'ry sin ;
And, as thou seest whose garments were made clean,
Wash'd in the blood of yon exalted Lamb.
Sav'd by his righteousness alone,
Spotless they stand before the throne,
And in th' etherial temple chaunt his praise ;
Himself among them deigus to dwell,
And face to face his light reveal :
Hunger and thirst, as heretofore,
And pain, and heat, they know no more ;
Nor need, as once, the sun's prolific rays,
Immanuel, here, his people feeds,
To streams of joy perennial leads,
And wipes, for ever wipes, the tears from ev'ry face."
- 2 Happy the souls releas'd from fear,
And safely landed there !
Some of the shining number, once, I knew,
And travell'd with them here :
Nay, some (my elder brethren now)
Sat later out for heav'n ; my junior saints below ;
Long after me, they heard the call of grace,
Which wak'd them unto righteousness.
How they have got beyond !
Converted last, yet first with glory crown'd !
Little, once, I thought that these
Would first the summit gain, [plain !
And leave me far behind, slow journeying thro' the Lov'd, while on earth ; nor less belov'd, tho' gone ;
Think not I envy you your crown ;
No ; if I could, I would not, call you down.
Tho' slower is my pace,
To you I'll follow on,
Leaning on Jesus all the way.
Who, now-and-then, lets fall a ray
Of comfort from his throne.
The shinings of his grace
Softens my passage thro' the wilderness,
And vines, nectareous, spring where briars grew
The sweet unveilings of his face
Make me, at times, near half as blest as you.
O might his beauty feast my ravis'd eyes,
His gladd'ning presence ever stay,
And cheer me all my journey thro' !
But soon the clouds return ; my triumph dies
Damp vapours from the valley rise,
And hide the hill at Sion from my view.
Spirit of light, thrice holy dove,
Brighten my sense of interest in that love
Which knew no birth, and never shall expire !
Electing goodness, firm and free,
My whole salvation hangs on thee,
Eldest and fairest daughter of eternity.
Redemption, grace, and glory too,
Our bliss above, and hopes below,
From her, their parent fountain flow ;
Ah, tell me, Lord, that thou hast chosen me
Thou, who hast kindled my intense desire,
Fulfil the wish thy influence did inspire,
And let me my election know !
Then, when thy summons bids me come up higher,
Well-pleas'd I shall from life retire,
And join the burning hosts, beheld at distance now

HYMN III. Happiness found.

- 1 HAPPINESS, thou lovely name,
Where's thy seat, O tell me where?
Learning, pleasure, wealth, and fame,
All cry out, "It is not here:"
Not the wisdom of the wise
Can inform me where it lies,
Not the grandeur of the great
Can the bliss I seek create.
- 2 Object of my first desire,
Jesus crucify'd for me!
All to happiness aspire,
Only to be found in thee:
Thee to praise, and thee to know,
Constitute our bliss below;
Thee to see, and thee to love,
Constitute our bliss above.
- 3 Lord, it is not life to live,
If thy presence thou deny;
Lord, if though thy presence give,
'Tis no longer death to die;
Source and giver of repose,
Singly from thy smile it flows;
Peace and happiness are thine;
Mine they are, if thou art mine.
- 4 Whilst I feel thy love to me,
Ev'ry object teems with joy;
Here O may I walk with thee,
Then into thy presence die!
Let me but thyself possess,
Total sum of happiness!
Real bliss I then shall prove;
Heav'n below, and heav'n above.

HYMN IV. Affliction.

- 1 ENCOMPASS' d with clouds of distress,
Just ready all hope to resign,
I pant for the light of thy face,
And fear it will never be mine:
Dishearten'd with waiting so long,
I sink at thy feet with my load;
All plaintive I pour out my song,
And stretch forth my hands unto God.
- 2 Shine, Lord, and my terror shall cease,
The blood of atonement apply;
And lead me to Jesus for peace,
The rock that is higher than I:
Speak, Saviour, for sweet is thy voice,
Thy presence is fair to behold;
I thirst for thy Spirit with cries
And groanings that cannot be told.
- 3 If sometimes I strive, as I mourn,
My hold of thy promise to keep,
The billows more fiercely return,
And plunge me again in the deep;
While harass'd, and cast from thy sight,
The tempter suggests, with a roar,
"The Lord hath forsaken thee quite,
Thy God will be gracious no more."
- 4 Yet, Lord, if thy love hath design'd
No covenant blessing for me,
Ah tell me, how is it I find
Some sweetness in waiting for thee?
Almighty to rescue thou art;
Thy grace is my only resource;
If e'er thou art Lord of my heart,
Thy Spirit must take it by force.

HYMN V. The Method of Salvation.

- THE Father we bless,
Whose distinguishing grace,
Selected a people to shew forth thy praise;
Nor is thy love known,
By election alone;
For O, thou hast added the gift of thy Son.

- 2 The goodness in vain
We attempt to explain,
Which found and accepted a ransom for men;
Great Surety of thine,
Thou didst not decline
To concur with the Father's most gracious design.
- 3 To Jesus our friend,
Our thanks shall ascend,
Who saves to the utmost, and loves to the end;
Our ransom he paid;
In his merit array'd
We attain to the glory for which we were made.
- 4 Sweet Spirit of grace,
Thy mercy we bless,
For thy eminent share in the council of peace;
Great agent divine,
To restore us is thine,
And cause us afresh in thy likeness to shine.
- 5 O God, 'tis thy part,
To convince and convert,
To give a new life, and create a new heart;
By thy presence and grace
We're upheld in our race,
And are kept in thy love to the end of our days.
- 6 Father, Spirit, and Son,
Agree thus in One,
The salvation of those he has mark'd for his own;
Let us too agree
To glorify thee,
Thou ineffable One, thou adorable Three.

HYMN VI. The evil Heart.

- 1 ASTONISH' d and distress'd,
I turn mine eyes within;
My heart with loads of guilt oppress'd,
The seat of every sin.
- 2 What crowds of evil thoughts,
What vile affections there!
Distrust, presumption, artful guile,
Pride, envy, slavish fear.
- 3 Almighty King of saints,
These tyrant lusts subdue;
Expel the darkness of my mind,
And all my powers renew.
- 4 This done, my cheerful voice
Shall loud hosannas raise;
My soul shall glow with gratitude,
My lips proclaim thy praise.

HYMN VII. Thy kingdom come.

- 1 O WHEN shall we, supremely blest,
Enter into our glorious rest!
Partake the triumphs of the sky,
And, holy, holy, holy, cry!
- 2 With all thy heav'nly hosts, with all
Thy blessed saints, we then shall fall;
And sing in extacy unknown,
And praise thee on thy dazzling throne.
- 3 Honour, and majesty, and pow'r,
And thanks and blessings evermore;
Who dost through endless ages live,
Thou, Lord, art worthy to receive.
- 4 For thou hast bid the creatures be,
And still subsist to pleasure thee;
From thee they came, to thee they tend,
Their gracious source, their glorious end!

HYMN VIII. The Propitiation.

- THY anger, for what I have done,
The gospel forbids me to fear;
My sins thou hast charg'd on thy Son;
Thy justice to him I refer:

Be mindful of Jesus and me !
My pardon he suffer'd to buy ;
And what he procur'd on the tree,
For me he demands in the sky.

HYMN IX. Assurance of Faith.

- 1 A DEBTOR to mercy alone,
Of covenant mercy I sing ;
Nor fear with thy righteousness on,
My person and off'rings to bring :
The terrors of law and of God
With me can have nothing to do ;
My Saviour's obedience and blood
Hide all my transgressions from view.
- 2 The work which his goodness began,
The arm of his strength will complete ;
His promise is, Yea and Amen,
And never was forfeited yet :
Things future, nor things that are now,
Not all things below nor above
Can make him his purpose forego,
Or sever my soul from his love.
- 3 My name from the palms of his hands
Eternity will not erase ;
Impress'd on his heart it remains
In marks of indelible grace ;
Yes, I to the end shall endure,
As sure as the earnest is giv'n ;
More happy, but not more secure,
The glorified spirits in heav'n.

HYMN X. To the Blessed Spirit.

- 1 HOLY Ghost, dispel our sadness,
Pierce the clouds of sinful night,
Come, thou source of sweetest gladness,
Breathe thy life, and spread thy light !
Loving Spirit, God of peace,
Great distributor of grace,
Rest upon this congregation,
Hear, O hear our supplication.
- 2 From that height which knows no measure,
As a gracious show'r descend,
Bringing down the richest treasure
Man can wish, or God can send ;
O thou glory, shining down
From the Father and the Son,
Grant us thy illumination !
Rest upon this congregation.
- 3 Come, thou best of all donations
God can give, or we implore ;
Having thy sweet consolations,
We need wish for nothing more :
Come with unction and with pow'r ;
On our souls thy graces show'r ;
Author of the new creation,
Make our hearts thy habitation.
- 4 Known to thee are all recesses
Of the earth, and spreading skies ;
Every sand the shore possesses,
Thy omniscient mind descries :
Holy fountain, wash us clean,
Both from error, and from sin !
Let us fly what thou refusest,
And delight in what thou choosest.
- 5 Manifest thy love for ever,
Fence us in on every side ;
In distress be our reliever ;
Guard, and teach, support, and guide :
Let thy kind, effectual grace,
Turn our feet from evil ways ;
Shew thyself our new creator,
And conform us to thy nature.
- 6 Be our friend on each occasion ;
God, omnipotent to save !
When we die, be our salvation ;
When we're buried be our grave :

And, when from the grave we rise,
Take us up above the skies ;
Seat us with thy saints in glory,
There for ever to adore thee.

HYMN XI. Divine Breathings.

- 1 I GROAN from sin to be set free,
From self to be releas'd ;
O take me, take me unto thee,
My everlasting rest !
- 2 Come, O my Saviour, come away !
Into my soul descend :
No longer from thy creature stay ;
My author, and my end !
- 3 The bliss thou hast for me prepar'd
No longer be delay'd :
Come, my exceeding great reward,
For whom I first was made.
- 4 Thou all our works in us hast wrought,
Our good is all divine ;
The praise of ev'ry virtuous thought
And righteous work is thine.
- 5 'Tis not of him that wills or runs,
That labours or desires ;
In answer to my Saviour's groans,
Thy love my breast inspires.
- 6 The meritorious cause I see,
That precious blood divine ;
And I, since Jesus died for me,
Shall live for ever thine.

HYMN XII. Psalm cxlvii. 1.

'Tis pleasant to sing
The sweet praise of our King,
As here in the valley we move ;
'T will be pleasanter still,
When we stand on the hill,
And give thanks to our Saviour above.

HYMN XIII. Hebrews x. 19.

We have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

- 1 O PRECIOUS blood, O glorious death,
By which the sinner lives !
When stung with sin, this blood we view,
And all our joy revives.
- 2 We flourish as the water'd herb,
Who keep this blood in sight,
The blood that chases our distress,
And makes our garments white.
- 3 The blood that purchas'd our release,
And washes out our stains,
We challenge earth and hell to shew
A sin it cannot cleanse.
- 4 Our scarlet crimes are made as wool,
And we brought nigh to God :
Thanks to that wrath-appeasing death ;
That heav'n-procuring blood.
- 5 The blood that makes his glorious Church
From ev'ry blemish free ;
And, O the riches of his love !
He pour'd it out for me.
- 6 Guilty and worthless as I am,
It all for me was giv'n ;
And boldness, through his blood, I have
To enter into heav'n.
- 7 Thither, in my great Surety's right,
I surely shall be brought !
He could not agonize in vain,
Nor spend his strength for nought.
- 8 He wills that I, and all his sheep,
Should reign with him in bliss ;
And pow'r he has to execute
What'er his will decrees.

- 9 The Father's everlasting love
And Jesus' precious blood
Shall be our endless themes of praise;
In yonder blest abode.
- 10 In patience let us then possess
Our souls, 'till he appear:
Our head already is in heav'n,
And we shall soon be there.
- HYMN XIV. A propitious gale longed for.
- 1 At anchor laid, remote from home,
Toiling I cry, sweet Spirit, come,
Celestial breeze, no longer stay,
But swell my sails, and speed my way.
- 2 Fain would I mount, fain would I glow,
And loose my cable from below;
But I can only spread my sail;
Thou, thou must breathe th' auspicious gale.

HYMN XV. All in all.

- 1 COMPARED with Christ, in all beside
No comeliness I see:
The one thing needful, dearest Lord,
Is to be one with thee.
- 2 The sense of our expiring love,
Into my soul convey;
Thyself bestow; for thee alone,
My all in all, I pray.
- 3 Less than thyself will not suffice
My comfort to restore
More than thyself I cannot crave;
And thou canst give no more.
- 4 Love of my God, for him again,
With love intense I'll burn:
Chosen of thee 'ere time began,
I'll choose thee in return.
- 5 What'e'er consist not with thy love,
O teach me to resign;
I'm rich to all th' intents of bliss,
If thou, O God, art mine.

HYMN XVI. Weak believers encouraged.

- 1 YOUR harps, ye trembling saints,
Down from the willows take:
Loud, to the praise of love divine,
Bid ev'ry string awake.
- 2 Tho' in a foreign land,
We are not far from home,
And nearer to our house above,
We ev'ry moment come.
- 3 His grace will to the end
Stronger and brighter shine;
Nor present things, nor things to come,
Shall quench the spark divine.
- 4 Fasten'd within the veil,
Hope be your anchor strong;
His loving Spirit the sweet gale,
That wafts you smooth along.
- 5 Or, should the surges rise,
And peace delay to come;
Blest is the sorrow, kind the storm,
That drives us nearer home.
- 6 The people of his choice
He will not cast away;
Yet do not always here expect
On Tabor's Mount to stay.
- 7 When we in darkness walk,
Nor feel the heav'nly flame:
Then is the time to trust our God,
And rest upon his name.
- 8 Soon shall our doubts and fears,
Subside at his control!
His loving kindness shall break through
The midnight of the soul.

- 9 No wonder, when God's love
Pervades your kindling breast,
You wish for ever to retain
The heart transporting guest.
- 10 Yet learn, in ev'ry state,
To make his will your own;
And, when the joys of sense depart,
To walk by faith alone.
- 11 By anxious fear depress'd,
When from the deep ye mourn,
"Lord, why so hasty to depart,
So tedious in return!"
- 12 Still on his plighted love,
At all events rely:
The very hidings of his face,
Shall train thee up to joy.
- 13 Wait till the shadows flee;
Wait thy appointed hour:
Wait till the bridegroom of thy soul
Reveals his love with pow'r,
- 14 The time of love will come,
When thou shalt clearly see
Not only that he shed his blood,
But that it flow'd for thee.
- 15 Tarry his leisure then,
Altho' he seem to stay:
A moment's intercourse with him
Thy grief will overpay.
- 16 Blest is the man, O God,
That stays himself on thee!
Who wait for thy salvation, Lord,
Shall thy salvation see.

HYMN XVII. Christ the light of his people.

- 1 I LEFT my heart and eyes to thee,
Jesus, thou unextinguish'd light,
My guardian stay and leader be,
My cloud by day, my fire by night.
- 2 Glory of Israel, shine within;
Unshadow'd, unclips'd appear:
With beams of grace exhale my sin;
Break forth, thou bright and morning star.
- 3 The earth a trackless lab'rinth is;
Be thou my thread and faithful clue!
Thy kingdom and thy righteousness,
The only objects I pursue.
- 4 Light of the Gentiles, thee I hail;
Essential truth, thyself impart I
Spirit of light, his face reveal,
And set thy signet on my heart.
- 5 Thy office 'tis t' enlighten man,
And point him to the heav'nly prize;
The hidden things of God t' explain,
And shine the darkness from our eyes.
- 6 Witness of Christ within my heart,
My int'rest in his love display;
My int'rest in that better part,
Which never can be torn away.
- 7 In bondage 'till thou set me free,
Fain would I know my part in him:
The brightness of his rising see,
And bask in thy meridian beam.
- 8 Shine then, thou uncreated ray!
If but a moment thou withdraw,
That moment sees me go astray,
That moment sees me break thy law.
- 9 The word and Spirit both conspiring
To tell thy Church she is forgiv'n;
And lift her daily high'r and high'r,
'Till all her joys are crown'd with heav'n.
- 10 To that bless'd realm of bright repose,
Thou wilt conduct my weary feet;
Where peace no interruption knows,
And where my sun shall never set.

HYMN XVIII. Leaning on the Beloved.

- 1 COURAGE, my soul, Jehovah speaks;
His promise is for thee:
"I never will forsake nor leave
The soul betroth'd to me."
- 2 The cheering word, as heav'nly dew,
My thirsty soul drinks in:
Jesus commands me to rejoice,
Who bore away my sin.
- 3 My Saviour's ever watchful eye,
Is over me for good:
What will he not on me bestow,
Who hath himself bestow'd?
- 4 Me to enrich, himself he made
Poor, and of no esteem:
The source, the true foundation, this,
Of all my love to him.
- 5 Dear Lord, into thy faithful hands,
My welfare I commit;
And to thy righteousness alone,
For safety I retreat.
- 6 Sorrows and agonies and death,
Thou didst endure for me,
When all the sins of God's elect
Were made to meet on thee.
- 7 Tho' worthy, in myself, of hell
And everlasting shame;
I cannot dread the frown divine,
Accepted in the Lamb.
- 8 Still on thy merit, gracious Lord,
Enable me to lean:
Ever in thee may I be found
My hiding-place from sin!
- 9 Exult, my soul; thy safety stands
Unshaken as his throne:
His people's everlasting life
Is founded on his own.

HYMN XIX. Before hearing.

- 1 SOURCE of light, and pow'r divine,
Deign upon thy truth to shine;
Lord, behold thy servant stands,
Lo, to thee he lifts his hands:
Satisfy his soul's desire,
Touch his lip with holy fire:
Source of light, and pow'r divine,
Deign upon thy truth to shine.
- 2 Breathe thy Spirit, so shall fall
Uncion sweet upon us all;
'Till, by odours scatter'd round,
Christ himself be trac'd and found;
Then shall ev'ry raptur'd heart,
Rich in peace and joy depart:
Source of light and pow'r divine,
Deign upon thy truth to shine.

HYMN XX. A Morning Hymn.

- 1 CHRIST, whose glory fills the skies,
Christ, the true, the only light,
Son of righteousness, arise,
Triumph o'er the shades of night;
Day spring from on high be near,
Day star in my heart appear.
- 2 Dark and cheerless is the morn,
Unaccompanied by thee;
Joyless is the day's return
'Till thy mercy's beams I see:
'Till they inward light impart,
Glad my eyes and warm my heart.
- 3 Visit then this soul of mine,
Pierce the gloom of sin and grief,
Fill me, radiancy divine;
Scatter all my unbelief;
More and more thyself display,
Shining to the perfect day.

HYMN XXI. A Chamber hymn.

- 1 WHAT tho' my frail eye-lids refuse
Continual watching to keep,
And punctual as midnight renews,
Demand the refreshment of sleep;
A sov'reign protector I have,
Unseen, yet for ever at hand,
Unchangeably faithful to save:
Almighty to rule and command.
- 2 From evil secure and its dread,
I rest if my Saviour is nigh,
And songs his kind presence indeed
Shall in the night season supply;
He smiles and my comforts abound,
His grace as the dew shall descend,
And walls of salvation surround
The soul he delights to defend.
- 3 Kind Author and ground of my hope,
Thee, thee, for my God I avow,
My glad Ebenezer set up,
And own thou hast help'd me 'till now;
I muse on the years that are past,
Wherein my defence thou hast prov'd,
Nor wilt thou relinquish at last
A sinner so signally lov'd.
- 4 Inspirer and hearer of pray'r,
Thou feeder and guardian of thine,
My all to thy covenant care
I sleeping and waking resign,
If thou art my shield and my sun,
The night is no darkness to me,
And fast as my moments roll on,
They bring me but nearer to thee.
- 5 Thy minist'ring spirits descend,
To watch while thy saints are asleep,
By day and by night they attend,
The heirs of salvation to keep;
Bright seraphs, despatch'd from the throne,
Repair to the stations assign'd,
And angels elect are sent down,
To guard the elect of mankind.
- 6 Thy worship no interval knows,
Their fervour is still on the wing:
And, while they protect my repose,
They chaunt to the praise of my king.
I too, at the season ordained,
Their chorus for ever will join:
And love and adore without end,
Their faithful Creator, and mine.

HYMN XXII. A Prayer, living and dying.

- 1 ROCK of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee;
Let the water and the blood
From thy riven side which flow'd
Be of sin the double cure,
Cleanse me from its guilt and pow'r.
- 2 Not the labours of my hands,
Can fulfil thy law's demands:
Could my zeal no respite know,
Could my tears for ever flow;
All for sin could not atone,
Thou must save and thou alone.
- 3 Nothing in my hand I bring,
Simply to thy cross I cling;
Naked come to thee for dress,
Helpless, look to thee for grace:
Foul I to the fountain fly,
Wash me, Saviour, or I die.
- 4 While I draw this fleeting breath,
When my eye-strings break in death;
When I soar to worlds unknown;
See thee on thy judgment throne,
Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee.

HYMN XXIII. To the Trinity.

ETERNAL hallelujahs
 Be to the Father giv'n,
 Who lov'd his own
 Ere time begun,
 And mark'd them out for heav'n.

2 Anthems of equal glory,
 Ascribe we to the Saviour;
 Who liv'd and died,
 That we, his bride,
 Might live with him for ever.

3 Hail, co-eternal Spirit,
 Thy Church's new Creator!
 The saints he seals,
 Their fear dispels,
 And sanctifies their nature.

4 We laud the glorious Triad,
 The mystic one in essence;
 Till call'd to join
 The hosts that shine
 In his immediate presence.

5 Faithful is he that promis'd,
 And stands engag'd to save us:
 The Triune Lord
 Has pass'd his word,
 That he will never leave us.

6 A kingdom he assign'd us,
 Before the world's foundation:
 Thou God of grace,
 Be thine the praise,
 And our's the consolation.

HYMN XXIV 2 Tim. i. 9. "Who hath saved us and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us before the world began."

1 How vast the benefits divine,
 Which we in Christ possess,
 Sav'd from the guilt of sin we are,
 And call'd to holiness.

2 But not for works which we have done,
 Or shall hereafter do,
 Hath God decreed on sinful worms
 Salvation to bestow.

3 The glory, Lord, from first to last,
 Is due to thee alone;
 Aught to ourselves we dare not take,
 Or rob thee of thy crown.

4 Our glorious Surety undertook
 To satisfy for man,
 And grace was giv'n us in him,
 Before the world began.

5 This is thy will, that in thy love
 We ever should abide,
 And lo, we earth and hell defy,
 To make thy counsel void.

6 Not one of all the chosen race,
 But shall to heav'n attain;
 Partake on earth the purpos'd grace,
 And then with Jesus reign.

7 Of Father, Son, and Spirit, we
 Extol the three-fold care,
 Whose love, whose merit, and whose pow'r,
 Unite to lift us there.

HYMN XXV. He hath borne our griefs, &c.

1 SURELY Christ thy griefs hath borne,
 Weeping soul no longer mourn:
 View him bleeding on the tree,
 Pouring out his life for thee;
 There thy ev'ry sin he bore,
 Weeping souls lament no more.

2 All thy crimes on him were laid,
 See upon his blameless head

Wrath its utmost vengeance pours,
 Due to my offence and yours;
 Wounded in our stead, he is Bruis'd for our iniquities.

3 Weary sinner, keep thine eyes,
 On the atoning sacrifice:
 There th' incarnate Deity,
 Number'd with transgressors see!
 There his Father's absence mourns,
 Nail'd and bruis'd, and crown'd with thorns.

4 See thy God his head bow down,
 Hear the man of sorrows groan!
 For thy ransom, there condemn'd,
 Stripp'd, derided, and blasphem'd;
 Bleed the guiltless for th' unclean,
 Made an offering for thy sin.

5 Cast thy guilty soul on him,
 Find him mighty to redeem:
 At his feet thy burden lay,
 Look thy doubts and cares away;
 Now by faith the Son embrace,
 Plead his promise, trust his grace.

6 Lord, thy arm must be reveal'd,
 Ere I can by faith be heal'd,
 Since I scarce can look to thee
 Cast a gracious eye on me;
 At thy feet, myself I lay,
 Shine, O shine my fears away.

HYMN XXVI. Faith in the promises.

1 WHAT in thy love possess I not,
 My star by night, my sun by day;
 My spring of life when parch'd with drought,
 My wine to cheer, my bread to stay;
 My strength, my shield, my safe abode,
 My robe before the throne of God.

2 From all eternity with love
 Unchangeable thou hast me view'd;
 Ere knew this beating heart to move,
 Thy tender mercies me pursu'd;
 Ever with me may they abide,
 And close me in on every side.

3 In suffer'ing be thy love my peace,
 In weakness be thy love my pow'r:
 And when the storms of life shall cease,
 Jesus, in that important hour;
 In death as life, be thou my guide,
 And save me, who for me hast died.

HYMN XXVII. Divine aid.

1 THE pow'r of hell, the strength of sin,
 My Jesus shall subdue:
 His healing blood shall wash me clean,
 And make my spirit new.

2 He will perform the work begun,
 Jesus, the sinner's friend,
 Jesus, the lover of his own,
 Will love me to the end.

3 No longer am I now afraid
 The promise shall take place,
 Perfect his strength in weakness made:
 Sufficient is his grace.

4 When thou dost in my heart appear,
 And love erects its throne;
 I then enjoy salvation here,
 And heaven on earth begun.

5 Lord, I believe, and rest secure
 In confidence divine;
 Thy promise stands for ever sure,
 And all thou art is mine.

HYMN XXVIII. Almighty power.

1 WHAT tho' I cannot break my chain
 Or e'er throw off my load;
 The things impossible to men,
 Are possible to God.

- 2 Who, who shall in thy presence stand,
Or match Omnipotence;
Unfold the grasp of thy right hand.
And pluck the sinner thence.
- 3 Faith to be heal'd I fain would have,
O might it now be giv'n;
Thou canst, thou canst the sinner save,
And make me meet for heav'n.
- 4 Bound down with twice ten thousand ties,
Yet let me hear thy call;
My soul in confidence shall rise,
Shall rise and break through all.
- 5 Thou canst o'ercome this heart of mine,
Thou wilt victorious prove;
For everlasting strength is thine,
And everlasting love.

HYMN XXIX. Mercy experienced.

- 1 Jesus, what hast thou bestow'd
On such a worm as me;
What compassion hast thou shew'd,
To draw me after thee;
Mindful of thy mercies past,
Still I trust the same to prove,
Still my helpless soul I cast,
On thy redeeming love.
- 2 Hast thou not revers'd my doom,
Thou hast, and I believe;
Yet I still a sinner come,
That thou may'st still forgive!
Wretched, miserable, blind,
Poor, and naked, and unclean,
Still that I may mercy find
I bring thee nought but sin.
- 3 Open, Lord, my inward ear,
And make my heart rejoice;
Bid my quiet spirit hear
Thy comfortable voice:
Silent am I now and still,
Dare not in thy presence move;
To my waiting soul reveal
The secrets of thy love.
- 4 Christ hath the foundation laid,
And Christ will build me up:
I shall certainly be made,
Partaker of his hope;
Author of my faith he is,
He its Finisher shall be,
Sov'reign grace has sealed me his,
To all eternity.

HYMN XXX. Fervent Desire.

- 1 FATHER, I want a thankful heart,
I want to taste how good thou art.
To plunge me in thy mercy's sea,
And comprehend thy love to me;
The length, and depth, and breadth, and height
Of love divinely infinite.
- 2 Jesus, my great High Priest above,
My friend before the throne of love!
If now for me prevails thy prayer,
If now I find thee pleading there,
Hear, and my weak petitions join,
Almighty Advocate, to thine.
- 3 O sovereign love, to thee I cry,
Give me thyself, or else I die;
Save me from death, from hell set free,
Death, hell, are but the want of thee;
My life, my crown, my heav'n thou art!
O may I find thee in my heart!

HYMN XXXI. *Written in illness,* Psalm civ. Ver. 34.*

"My meditation of him shall be sweet."

- 1 WHEN languor and disease invade
This trembling house of clay

'Tis sweet to look beyond our cage,
And long to fly away.

- 2 Sweet to look inward and attend
The whispers of his love:
Sweet to look upward to the place
Where Jesus pleads above.
- 3 Sweet to look back and see my name
In life's fair book set down;
Sweet to look forward and behold
Eternal joys my own.
- 4 Sweet to reflect how grace divine
My sins on Jesus laid;
Sweet to remember that his blood
My debt of sufferings paid.
- 5 Sweet on his righteousness to stand,
Which saves from second death;
Sweet to experience day by day,
His Spirit's quick'ning breath.
- 6 Sweet on his faithfulness to rest,
Whose love can never end;
Sweet on his covenant of grace,
For all things to depend.
- 7 Sweet in the confidence of faith,
To trust his firm decrees;
Sweet to lie passive in his hand,
And know no will but his.
- 8 Sweet to rejoice in lively hope,
That, when my change shall come,
Angels will hover round my bed,
And waft my spirit home.
- 9 There shall my disimprison'd soul
Behold him and adore;
Be with his likeness satisfy'd,
And grieve and sin no more.
- 10 Shall see him wear that very flesh
On which my guilt was lain;
His love intense, his merit fresh,
As tho' but newly slain.
- 11 Soon too my slumb'ring dast shall hear
The trumpet's quick'ning sound;
And, by my Saviour's power rebuilt,
At his right hand be found.
- 12 These eyes shall see him in that day,
The God that died for me;
And all my rising bones shall say,
Lord, who is like to thee?

- 13 If such the views which grace unfolds
Weak as it is below,
What raptures must the Church above
In Jesu's presence know!
- 14 If such the sweetness of the stream,
What must the fountain be,
Where saints and angels draw their bliss
Immediately from thee.
- 15 O may the unction of these truths,
For ever with me stay;
'Till from her sinful cage dismiss'd
My spirit flies away.

HYMN XXXII. The dying believer to his soul.

- 1 DEATHLESS principle, arise;
Soar thou native of the skies.
Pearl of price by Jesus bought,
To his glorious likeness wrought,
Go to shine before his throne;
Deck his mediatorial crown;
Go, his triumphs to adorn;
Made for God, to God return.
- 2 Lo, he beckons from on high!
Fearless to his presence fly:
Thine the merit of his blood;
Thine the righteousness of God.

* The late Countess of Huntingdon had the original of this most beautiful piece of poetry sent her by the Author. The right Honourable Lady Anne Erskine gave herself considerable trouble to procure it for the Editor, for which obliging politeness a condescension he returns this public acknowledgment.

- 3 Angels, joyful to attend,
Hov'ring, round thy pillow bend;
Wait to catch the signal giv'n,
And escort thee quick to heav'n.
- 4 Is thy earthly house distrest?
Willing to retain her guest?
'Tis not thou, but she, must die:
Fly, celestial tenant, fly.
Burst thy shackles, drop thy clay,
Sweetly breathe myself away;
Singing, to thy crown remove;
Swift of wing, and fir'd with love.
- 5 Shudder not to pass the stream:
Venture all thy care on him;
Him, whose dying love and pow'r
Still'd its tossing, hush'd its roar.
Safe is the expanded wave;
Gentle as a summer's eve:

- Not one object of his care
Ever suffer'd shipwreck there.
See the haven full in view?
Love divine shall bear thee through.
Trust to that propitious gale:
Weigh thy anchor, spread thy sail.
- 6 Saints in glory perfect made,
Wait thy passage through the shade:
Ardent for thy coming o'er,
See, they throng the blissful shore.
Mount, their transports to improve:
Join the longing choir above:
Swiftly to their wish be giv'n:
Kindle higher joy in heav'n.
Such the prospects that arise
To the dying Christian's eyes!
Such the glorious vista Faith
Opens through the shades of death.

GENERAL INDEX.

A.

Abbot, Dr. George, Archbishop of Canterbury, joins with Sir H. S. in printing Bradwardin's Book against Pelagianism, 106. A remarkable anecdote, retrieved and related by him, concerning the miscarriage of Calvin's scheme for a general union of the reformed churches, 207, 208, note. His character and account of P. Martyr's wife, 219, 220, note. Bertius's Book against final perseverance sent to this Archbishop, 231. The resentment conceived against Bertius on that account, 231, 232. Remarkable passage, concerning the extent of redemption, in a letter written to this Archbishop, by the British divines at Dort, 241.

Abbot, Dr. Robert, Bishop of Sarum, publicly censures Laud, 261.

Abraham, was justified before he offered up Isaac, 167. In what respect he was justified by works, 166, 167, 335.

Accident, no such thing, 666.

Accursed from Christ, what St. Paul meant by the wish, 436.

Ackworth, Mr., public orator of Cambridge; his public encomiums on Bucer and Fagius, 219.

Adam and Eve, necessitarians antecedently to their fall, 811.

Adheral, Mr., dies in prison for the gospel, 191.

Advent Sunday, a meditation upon it, 437.

Adversity, a good teacher, 502.

Affliction, the right improvement of, 136. Absolutely necessary in the Christian's lot, 307, 337. Dealt out with an unerring hand, 102.

Abigensens and Waldenses, churches of, whence so called, 89. Their great antiquity, ibid. Abounded in most parts of Europe, 90. Extracts from their several confessions of faith, ibid. Severely persecuted by the church of Rome, 92. At the Reformation, had recourse to Zuinglius and Calvin to supply them with preachers, 89.

Alexander VII. (Pope), fulminates against the doctrines of grace, 73. Orders Jansenius's tomb to be demolished, 72, note.

Alfred, his concealment in a shepherd's house, 281. The immortal institutor of juries, ibid. Probability of his dividing England into shires, ibid. The distribution of his time, and death, ibid.

All, frequent Scripture signification of that term, 53.

Allerton, Mr. Ralph, the martyr, 177.

Almsgiving, how enforced by the church of England, 271.

Alsop, Rev. Mr., some account of, 479—481.

Andrews, Dr. Launcelot, Bishop of Winchester, his high character of Calvin, 161. Remarkable passages in his private devotions, 253, note.

Anecdotes and incidents, 459—517.

Angels, the glorified souls of departed infants seem to be called by that name in Scripture, 58.

—, supposed to bear an especial part in the solemnities of public worship, 382—383.

Antinomianism, considered, 319. The term often used by way of deception, 358.

Antipathies, often founded in nature, 827.

Apostle's Creed, history of, 438.

Apparitions, some sensible and modest reflections upon the theory of, 388.

Applause, popular, whether it can yield solid satisfaction to a truly great mind, 883.

Appropriation of Christ's merit, to one's own self in particular, requisite to the joy of faith, 142. 165. 177. 199. 227.

Aquinas, Thomas, a very wavering predestinarian, 75. Asserts free will, together with the conditionality and defectibility of grace, 76. A maintainer of merits, ibid. Extremely inconsistent with himself, 77.

Arctin, Peter, his extreme vanity, 828.

Arianism, its general prevalence in the fourth century, 59. Opened an immediate door to Pelagianism, ibid. and Arminianism compared, 757.

Aristotle, his definition of the word Necessity, 787. Supposed free-will to be the source of virtue, 792. His inconsistency, ibid, note.

Armagh, a Popish Archbishop of, in the fourteenth century, denied Christ's foreknowledge, rather than give up human free-will, 102, note.

Arminianism, its coincidence with Pelagianism, 54. 60. 221. 264. And with Popery, 54, 55, 70, 71, 72. 76. 222. 230. 278. Zealously propagated by the Jesuits of the last century, 55. Why so zealously cherished by Charles I., 241. 252. Easy transition from, to Popery, 75, note. Coincides with Ranterism, 77—80. Has no just pretence to primitive antiquity, 81, note. 82. Very ill calculated to promote holiness of life, 52, note. 278. Leads directly to the very worst part of Stoicism, 103. Era of its visible extension in England, 228. The true holds of the pit whence it was digged, 232, note. Atheistical tendency of, see Atheism. Causes of its progress, 258. Solemnly, but falsely, disclaimed by Archbishop Laud, 257. The violent means by which it was promoted under Charles the First, 252. 254. 264. Poured in as a flood when Charles the Second mounted the throne, 266. Lies at the root of all the present irreligion of the times, 275. Its tremendous tendencies, 278. Constitutes the very essence of Methodism, 279. A concise view of what it is, 674, note. Its innate tendency to licentiousness, 740. 758, 759. Supposes it possible that Christ himself might have sinned and perished everlastingly, 787, note. A very unphilosophical scheme, 790, note. Supposes God and Christ to be immortal agents, 793. Represents man as an independent being, 795. 819. Its principles incompatible with the Scripture doctrine of a future judgment, 796. And with miracles, prophecies, and foreknowledge, 800. 806. Subversive of Divine Providence, 807. 813. How far it coincides with Manichæism, 816. And how it improves upon that heresy, ibid. A system of atheism, 791. 805. 807—819. The bane of morality and good works, ibid, note. The heresy of Rome, 662.

Arminians (English), they and the Papists slander the doctrines of grace with the self-same cavils, 97. note. The cant names wherewith some modern ones cajole each other, 50. A very novel sect, 202. 229. Eminent for being of a persecuting spirit, 246. The disadvantages under which they laboured at their first appearance in England, 228. Forced to throw themselves into the court scale, to avoid persecution, ibid. Coalesced into one state faction with the Papists, 229. Remarks on that alliance, ibid. Struck with a panic by the proceedings at Dort, 246. When they began to recover, 247. Gained much ground after James's death, 252. Two remarkable instances of their opposition to the doctrine of election, 419. One undesignedly acknowledging election, 505. Very lame defenders of Christianity, 796. Not fond of St. Paul, 799. Are verging fast towards an acknowledgment of God's foreknowledge, 806.

Arminians (Dutch), drift of the primitive ones, 230. Supported by France and Spain, 230. 236. Their insolent behaviour at the synod of Dort, 239. The synod strives in vain to soften them into decency and moderation, 243, note. First affirm and then deny the power of the magistrates in matters of religion, 241, 242. Refuse to give a positive account of their faith, 242. Artfully, but absurdly, put reprobation before election, 243. Their frivolous exceptions to the Palatine confession, ibid. Those from Utrecht were offered seats in the synod as members, ibid, note. Deposed at length from their ministry, 244. Severe persecutors of the orthodox when they were able, 230. Whether the Arminians might be said to have been persecuted in return, 245, 246.

- Arminius, James, his journey to Rome, 55. On friendly terms with the Socinians in Poland, ibid. Acknowledges predestination to be a doctrine the Papists cannot bear with, ibid. The year of his birth, 125, note. Remarkable proof of his obscurity during his life time, 233. Confusions occasioned in Holland by his schism, 230, 237. From what fountain he drew his heresies, 232, note. His memory and tenets execrated by James the First, 230, 232, 234.
- Articles of the Church of England, subscribed to by King Edward VI., 61. Cannot be honestly signed by Arminians, 74, and note., 113, 125. Not drawn up ambiguously and with latitude, ibid. Were passed and subscribed by the same convocation which subscribed and authorised Ponet's catechism, 127. Were published and bound with the said catechism, 127, note. The reason why, ibid. Bishop Ridley's solemn and pathetic attestation to them a little before his martyrdom, 129. Peter Martyr concerned in composing them, 156. Commented on by Rogers, 192. Highly regarded by the martyrs, 189. Added to the articles of Ireland, by a convocation there, 255. Subscription not so much a grievance as the orthodoxy of them, 300. The Seventeenth Article, Mr. Wesley's opinion of, 615.
- Articles of Lambeth. See Lambeth articles.
- Accough, Mrs., the martyr, her character and sufferings, 120, 121. Verses written by her in Newgate, ibid., note. Her judgment concerning final perseverance, ibid.
- Assistance, divine, an explication of that term, 62.
- Assurance, of our own personal election and salvation attainable in the present life, 60, 121, 131, 134, 143, 144, 151, 165, 166, 168, 169, 172, 173, 175, 184, 187, 189, 195, 198, 199, 206, note., 214, 225, 227. No presumption, and objections against the privileges thereof answered, 321, 330, note. Assurance of God's love, and the light of his countenance, two distinguishable things, 369. Assurance of faith further considered, 441, 442. And the sense of the church of England thereon, 658, 659.
- Athanasian creed, history of, 438.
- Atheism, free-will the direct road to it, 108, note. 154, 212, 232, note. 278. Promoted by Arminianism, 742, 753.
- Athelstan, King, his reign, death and burial, 282.
- Atonement of Christ, the sole and absolute foundation of a pardon, 128, 129, 138, 139. Arminianism reduces it to a mere nothing, 278.
- Austin, St., why the church of Rome professes to esteem him, 77. That church under a very embarrassing dilemma concerning him, ibid., note. Some of his books condemned in the Romisk Index Expurgatorius, ibid., note. A summary of his theological system, ibid. St. Jerom's address to him, 82. His doctrine of the two worlds, 93. Asserts the perfection, efficacy, and immutability of God's foreknowledge, 108, 109. His sentiments concerning fate, 109. Disproves the doctrine of free-will, by an argument drawn from the foreknowledge of God, 111. Converted from Manichæism to Christianity, 813.
- Austerity and morose severity repugnant to spiritual joy, 404.
- Austoo, James and Margaret, martyrs, 177.
- Aviceroes, the Arabian philosopher, asserts the independence of God's foreknowledge, 108.
- Azincourt, battle of, 554.
- B.
- BAINHAM, Mr., the martyr, 117. Support under the torments of sufferings, ibid.
- Baker, Sir Richard, his account of the synod of Dort, 246.
- Balanquhal, Dr., sent to Dort as a minister of Scotland, 238, 244.
- Bale, Bishop, the antiquarian, his account and vindication of Edward VI., 62.
- Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, an excellent rule of his respecting predestination, 134, 236. Had a hand in the Lambeth articles, 214. Waits on Queen Elizabeth in her last illness, 227.
- Baptism, not a real but a typical regenerating, 138, 645. Sometimes attended with the renovating influence of the Holy Spirit, ibid. Curious baptism administered by Mr. Wesley, 279. An acknowledgment of human sinfulness, 328. Baptism of the dead, an illustration of it, 476. Definition of Baptism, 645.
- Barber, Mr., a providential deliverance of his, 508.
- Barnabas, St., some account of him, 82. Largely cited, 83, 84.
- Barnevell, the principal factor of Arminianism in Hol-
- land, 230. Beheaded for his traitorous practices, 237.
- Barnes, Dr. Robert, the martyr, 121.
- Buro, Peter, some account of, 212. Complained of by the University of Cambridge, 213. Archbishop Whitgift's early suspicions of him, ibid. Sample of his tenets, ibid. Remarkable particulars which passed in conversation between the Archbishop and him, 214. Acknowledges the Lambeth articles to be true, and yet refuses to sign them, 216. Archbishop Hutton's advice concerning him, 215. Forced to retreat from Cambridge, ibid.
- Burret, William, 75, note. 213, 260. His sermon and recantation, 674.
- Bartolini, a shrewd salvo wherewith he comforted himself, 76, note.
- Barter, Mr., his thoughts of good works when dying, 505.
- Barter, Mr. (the philosopher), his theory of dreams, 516. A remark concerning, ibid., note. Quotations from, 789, 790, note.
- Bayle, Monsieur, his observations concerning intemperate zeal, 48. His just remark on the Arminianism of the Romish church, 77, note.
- Beket, Thomas, a description of his insuperable pride, 286. His exile, ibid. And restoration, ibid.
- Beda, or Bede, character of him, 99. A remarkable incident attending his last moments, ibid. His hatred of Pelagianism, ibid. Opposes Pelagius on the articles of free-will and conditional election, 100.
- Believer, a true one cannot be an Antinomian, 430.
- Bellarmino, Cardinal, received priest's orders from the hands of Jansenius, 72. Appears to have been the inventor of double justification, 223.
- Bertius, Peter, sends a copy of his book against final perseverance to Archbishop Abbot, 231. Audaciously asserts that the defectibility of grace is a doctrine of the church of England, ibid. For which King James calls him "a gross liar," 233. Educated under Arminius, 231. Preaches at Arminius's funeral, 75, note. Turns Papist, ibid., and 755, note.
- Bentley, Dr. Richard, his high opinion of himself, 828.
- Bertram, his book concerning the Lord's Supper opened Bishop Ridley's eyes on that subject, 132.
- Beton, Cardinal, the articles for which he sentenced Mr. Hamilton, 122.
- Beveridge, Bishop, affirms that the doctrine of efficacious grace was the doctrine of the primitive church, 81.
- Beza, Theodore, a remarkable letter of his to Archbishop Whitgift, testifying his high respect for the church of England, 162. Presents a copy of his annotations to Archbishop Grindal, 211. His beautiful verses on the piety and patriotism of Zuvinglius, 217, note.
- Bible, English, Tyndale and Coverdale concerned in translating it, 118, 193. Their translation corrected and republished by Archbishop Cranmer, ibid. A description of Cranmer's editions, with extracts, 193, 194. Authorized editions of the Bible in the reign of Elizabeth, with extracts, 193, 194—197. Present translation of, why published without marginal annotations, 247, and note.
- Bigotry, what it is, 724. Its baneful tendency, ibid.
- Biography, 451—494.
- Birds, a consideration on, 518.
- Bishops, of the church of England: a general character of those who flourished under King Edward, 163, 258. Queen Elizabeth's bishops compare the reprobate to a company of dancing bears, 196. Advise her Majesty to shut up the free-willers in Wallingford Castle, 205. Enjoin the clergy to study Bullinger's decades, 217. Eminent for their detestation of free-will and all Pelagianism, 223, 258. Remarkable proofs of the general orthodoxy of the bishops and clergy in Charles the First's reign, 226, 252, 272, 273. Humble and earnest address to the present bench of bishops, 277, 279. A hint to them from the confessional, 277. An uncivil sarcasm on, by the late Duke of Newcastle, 598.
- Bishops' Bible, 194, 195.
- Bilney, Mr., the martyr, 117. His definition of the church, ibid.
- Blasphemies, Arminian, a sample of, 49.
- Blaethius, an account of him, 110, note. His doctrine concerning providence and fate, 110, 111.
- Bujermannus, the ecclesiastical president of the synod of Dort, expostulates with the cited Arminians, 241, 243. Their rugged stubbornness proof against every healing expedient he could propose, 243. His last speech to them, ibid., note.

- Bolingbroke, Lord, his remark on Calvin's doctrine, 501.
- Bolsec, Jerom, a noisy Pelagian, some account of him, 75, note. Substance of his sermon against predestination, ibid. Turns Papist, ibid.
- Bonner, Edmund, the popish bishop of London, fabricates a pastoral letter out of the Pia et Catholica Institutio, 164, note. His coal-house, a common place of confinement for Protestant ministers, 184. Extract from an anonymous letter to him, 191. Joins with Gardiner in imposing on Calvin by a forged letter, in order to defeat that reformer's plan for comprehending all Protestants in one visible communion, 207, 208, note.
- Boyle, Mr., his masterly observations concerning the sensible qualities, 821—825, note.
- Bradford, Mr., the martyr, his humility, 102, note. Visits dying Bucer, 151. Mr. Careless's letter to him, 175. Mr. Strype's character of him, 178. A memorable saying of Bucer's to him, ibid. Bishop Ridley's high opinion of him, ibid. Large proof of his Calvinism, 179—182. His exemplary meekness and charity, 183.
- Bradshaw, President, when he died, and his re-entertainment, 867.
- Bradwardin, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, 104—106. Taught Dr. Wickliff the true nature of faith and justification, 106. Insulted, ibid. His reflections on the prevalence of Pelagianism, ibid. His reason for the immutability of God, ibid. Batters down human merit, 107. Asserts the most absolute Providence, ibid. Substance of what he delivers concerning God's knowledge of all things, 108. Maintains the will of God to be irresistible, 109. Asserts the doctrine of fate, 110, 111. His judicious definition of predestination, 111. Denies the spiritual powers of man's free-will, 112, 113. Demonstrates the final perseverance of the elect, 113. Encouraged by a very singular dream, 517.
- Bruin, fibrous commotion of, the grand medium by which an embodied spirit perceives, 789. Consequence of its different dimension in different men, 791.
- Bray, Vicar of, the famous story of, 766.
- Brookes, Mr., censured for Arminianism by the University of Oxford, 262.
- Browne, Rev. Mr. Moses, an excellent answer of his, 495.
- Brown, Mr. Simon, anecdote of, ibid.
- Brownists, 273.
- Brutes, cruelty to, unnecessary and criminal, 443. Sagacity of, 520. Do not consist of organized matter only, 791, note. Divine Providence, the disposer of their lives and death, 810.
- Brydges, Mr. Gabriel, censured for Arminianism by the University of Oxford, 262.
- Bucer, Dr. Martin, 147. Vossius's encomium on him, ibid. By whom and for what invited to England, 147. Made divinity professor at Cambridge, 148. Revises and corrects the English Liturgy, 148, 159. Remarkable for his warm attachment to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England, 158. His sentiments concerning predestination, 149. His remarks on the obduration of Pharaoh, 149. Asserts reprobation, ibid. His doctrine of election and perseverance, 149, 150. And of limited redemption, 150. His death and funeral, 151. His bones dug up and burned in the reign of Mary, 218, 219. A great admirer of our church homilies, 158. Whether he held the merit of works, ibid. His modest and candid apology for retracting some past expressions of his, which had been misinterpreted by some merit-mongers, ibid. His doctrine of predestination basely slandered by three popish doctors, 218. Remarkable honours rendered to his memory by Queen Elizabeth and the church of England, 218, 219.
- Buckingham, Duke of (Charles the First's favourite), beset and watched by Jesuits and Arminians, 55. Was the person to whom Dr. Laud owed his promotion, 248.
- Bullinger, Bishop Hooper's parting conversation with him, 145, 146. Concerned in drawing up the larger Helvetic confession, 200, 201. More of him, 210, 212, 216. His decades ordered to be studied by English clergymen, 217.
- Bulls, Papal, 67, 68, 69, 73, 74.
- Bunyan, Mr. John, a reply of his, 505.
- Burgh, Mr., his conversations on natural and moral evil, 857.
- Burnett, Bishop, his character of King Edward VI., 62. Prevails with the state of Genoa to abolish subscriptions, 64. Would willingly have played the same game in England, ibid. His lamentation, 65, note. Anecdote of him, 495.
- Bury, Richard de, Bishop of Durham, 105.
- C.
- Calamy, Dr. Edmund, his character of John Goodwin, 57.
- Calling, effectual, a fruit of election, 225.
- Calvin, numbered by Christopher Potter himself among the worthiest doctors of the church, 66, note. Confutes the council of Trent, 70, note. His account of Bolsec's sermon, 75, note. Remark on the dedication of his institutions, 81, note. The English Liturgy remodelled in consequence of his reonstrances, 160, 161. Approves of a set form of public prayer, and administrations of the sacraments, 159, 207. Held in extreme veneration by King Edward, and the English reformers, 160, 161. Prevails with the court of England to release Bishop Hooper from confinement, ibid. Altars in the churches converted into communion tables, at his desire, ibid. Requested by Cramer to write often to King Edward, ibid. The high terms of honour in which he is mentioned by our old English bishops and others, ibid. Remarkable instance of his meekness, 162. His approbation of the liturgy and ceremonies of the church of England, ibid. No enemy to episcopacy, 163, 207, 208. Corresponds with Archbishop Parker, 207. Receives the thanks of Queen Elizabeth's privy council, ibid. Offers a plan in the reign of Edward for a general union of Protestants, 207, note. That excellent scheme frustrated by the crafty intrigues of the council of Trent, then sitting, ibid., note. And by the audacious subtlety of Bonner and Gardiner, 208, note. Calvin renews the same proposal to Queen Elizabeth's administration, 207. But dies before it could take effect, ibid. Archbishop Grindal's great esteem of him, 210. Much honoured by Archbishop Whitgift, 217. His judicious caveat against the abuse of predestination, 236. His book of Institutes highly valued by the English bishops, universities, and clergy, 258, 261. Falsely charged with terming reprobation a horrible decree, 274, 275.
- Calvinism, the prevailing system under Edward VI., Elizabeth, and James, 51, 204, 249, 251. Extremely odious to the church of Rome, 55. Why Laud strove to smother it, 66. Acknowledged by our adversaries themselves to be the system of our English Reformers, 124, 126, 204, 238, 619. Does not countenance moral remissness, 174, 198, 199. By whom first publicly opposed in the church of England, since the Reformation, 213. When and why slandered with the name of Puritanism, 228. Vindicated as the doctrine of the church of England, in a letter of Mr. Toplady's to Dr. Nowell, 610.
- Calvinists (Doctrinal), why discountenanced by Charles I., 48. To whom we are indebted for the name, 95, note. Why persecuted by the church of Rome, 116. Were cruelly persecuted in Holland, by the first Arminians there, 229, 230.
- Calvino Furcivimus, some account of a Popish book so entitled, 114, note. Answered by Dr. Sutcliffe, dean of Exeter, ibid.
- Cambridge, University of, complains of, and prosecutes, Baro the Pelagian, 212, 213. Her zeal to vindicate the honour of Bucer and Fagius, 219. See Universities.
- Camden, Mr., his account of the Familists, 78. His oblique fling at the Arminians, ibid. Character of Bishop Carleton, 245, note.
- Campneys, a very hot free-will man, some account of him, 218. Smartly taken to task by Veron and Crowley, ibid.
- Candour, a distinction concerning it, 49. Mr. Wesley the worse for being treated with it, ibid.
- Canon, Dr., a very shy divine, 215, 216.
- Canterbury and Geneva, well agreed in the sixteenth century, 173, 208, 209, 211.
- Camute, his reign, death and burial, 233.
- II., supposed to have died in a state of inebriety, ibid.
- Cardan (Jerom), his account of Edward VI., 63. Remarkable instance of that philosopher's integrity, ibid.
- Cardmaker, Mr. John, the martyr, 171.
- Careless, Mr. John, dies in prison for the Protestant faith, 174—177. Examined concerning predestination, by the Popish commissary, 174. Extracts from his inestimable letters, 175, 176. In his estimation, free-will and phariseism are reciprocal, 175.
- Carleton, Dr. George, Bishop of Chichester, asserts the divine rights of episcopacy in the synod of Dort, 208, note. Imputes the rampancy of Arminianism in Holland to the want of bishops there, ibid. His testimony to the Calvinism of the church of England, 226. Sent by King James to the synod of Dort, 238. His

INDEX.

- particular department while there, 244. His conversation with the heads of the Arminian party in Holland, 240. Denies universal redemption to be a doctrine of the church of England, 245, note. Other particulars concerning him, ibid. And some account of him, 467.
- Castlio*, Sebastian, some account of him, 203. A book of his in behalf of free will and perfection gives great offence in England, ibid.
- Catechism*, the, ascribed to Bishop Ponet, enjoined to be taught by all schoolmasters in the English dominions, 61, 129. Received and subscribed to by all Protestants throughout England, 64. The Papists very angry at it, 201. Extracts from it, 128, 129. Subscribed by Cranmer, 126. And by Ridley, ibid. And by the same convocation which settled the articles of religion in Edward's time, 127. Appears to have been drawn up by the Reformers themselves, ibid, note. Bishop Ridley, on his trial at Oxford, publicly acknowledged that he himself had a hand in compiling it, 126. Had the authority both of church and state for its sanction, 127. Evidently designed as an amplification of the articles of religion, ibid. A most remarkable concession of Heylin concerning it, ibid. Bishop Ridley's high esteem of it, 129, 130. Published and bound up with the book of articles, 127, note. An edition of it printed in Latin, that foreigners might know on and to what principles our church was reformed from Popery, 129. Revived in the reign of Elizabeth, and approved of by the same convocation which settled our present XXXIX articles, 201, 202. What are the doctrines of it, 626.
- Causton*, Mr. Thomas, the martyr, 167.
- Cave*, Dr., his account of Pelagianism, 80. His high encomium on the Stoical morality, 153.
- Caveat* against unsound doctrines, undauntedly displayed, 307, &c.
- Chair*, a stone one, in Westminster Abbey, reported by tradition to be the same that served Jacob for a pillow, 290, 291.
- Chance*, in what sense that term was used by our old divines, 136, 196. Mr. Chambers' observations on, 668, note. The mere creature of fancy, 811. If it mean any thing, it means uncertainty of event, ibid. A very comfortless doctrine, ibid.
- Charles I.*, account of the state of religion in his reign, 55, 66, 67. Why he favoured the progress of Popery, 66, note. Came to the crown at a very unfavourable juncture, 251. Reflections on certain circumstances of inconsistency which attended his zeal against predestination, 254.
- Charles II.*, why he spared John Goodwin from hanging, 57. Turretin's character of that prince, 266, note.
- Charles XII.*, his unconcernedness in danger, 500.
- Charnock*, Mr. Stephen, character of, 266. An extract from, 701, note. Quoted, 803, note. 807, note. His admirable treatise on the divine attributes, 803, note.
- Chesterfield*, Lord, a summary of his moral and religious creed, 607. His letters what, ibid. His style inaccurate and desultory, 858. His character of Dr. Johnson, 867. An instance of his dissimulation, 868.
- Chicanery*, of Dr. Nowell, exposed, 618.
- Christ*'s agony and crucifixion, a striking description of, 331—333. Subjection to the Father, in what respect, 434. Blood and righteousness, a sign whereby to know if we have a happy interest in them, 429.
- Christianity*, mysterious, as also every object around us, 326.
- Christmas* meditation, 424.
- Chronology* of England, 280.
- Church*, definitions of, 67, 68, 74, 90, 91, 96, 103, 117, 128, 170, 171, 202.
- Church* (primitive) the doctrines of grace not opposed in it, till the rise of Pelagius, 80—82.
- Church of England*, her condition under Edward VI., 163, 260. Agrees with the Swiss confession of faith, 200. Considered the Free-willers as the most inveterate of her enemies, 205. Her high Calvinism, 204, 226. Maintains the final perseverance of the elect, 231, 264. Her forlorn condition during the usurpation, 265. How far restored by Charles the Second, 266. Was not reformed on Arminian principles, 270, 271. Remarks on the present state of, 275. Vindicated in a letter to Dr. Nowell, 618.
- Chrysostom*, St., a frequent and favourite saying of his, 812.
- Cicero*, his definition of fortune or chance, 787.
- Circumstantial*, in religion, ought not to occasion a suspension of brotherly affections, 402. Illustrated also by a note of the late Rev. Mr. Ryland, 496, note.
- Citydon*, Mr., the martyr, 117.
- Cleanthes*, the Stoic poet, his fine verses concerning fate, 152, 153.
- Clemens Romanus*, 84. Extracts from his first Epistle to the Corinthians, 84, 85.
- Clement*, Mr. John, the martyr, 188. Employed by his brother martyrs to draw up a confession of faith, as a standing monument of their universal agreement in the doctrines of grace, ibid. An extract from that confession, 189. Some particulars concerning himself, 191. His remains buried in the same dunghill with those of Mr. Careless and Mr. Adkeral, ibid.
- Clergy* of the church of England, a humble address to them, 275. The complicated guilt of such of them as seek to subvert her doctrines, 130, note. The increasing contempt of the clergy accounted for, 278.
- Clerical* subscription no grievance, 340, &c.
- Cobham*, Lord, fell a sacrifice to the bigotry and craft of the Romish ecclesiastics, 113. Cruel manner of his execution, 114. Was a disciple of Wickliff, ibid.
- Cole*, Mr. Thomas, observations from, 372.
- Coleman-street*, John Goodwin's meeting-house there, the head quarters of the Fifth-monarchy-men, 56, note. Two of those rebels hung in that street before the door of the said Goodwin's meeting-house, ibid, note.
- Colossians* i. 24. explained, 169.
- Colour*, not a real property in matter, 821, 823. Whence our ideas of it result, 821, 826.
- Communion* with God, how to be attained, 369. The grand remedy against undue fears, 381.
- Compulsion*, not inferrible from the efficacy of divine grace, 94. Distinguishable and different from certainty of event, 787.
- Confession*, a public, of Mr. Toplady, 311.
- Confessional*, author of, his remark on the Calvinistic articles of the church of England, 74. His just rebuke of Arminian subscription to those articles, ibid, note. Is rather unandid to the synod of Dort, 243, note. Menaces the bishops with a probable overthrow of the hierarchy, 277.
- Constance*, council of, their maxim, 96. Their treachery in condemning Dr. Huss to the flames, ibid, note.
- Consideration* on that remarkable passage in Hebrews vi. 4—6, 433.
- Consubstantiation*, Lutheran doctrine of, 268.
- Contentment*, a consequence of faith in predestination, 135.
- Constitution*, English, thoughts thereon, 393.
- Controversy*, in what respect friendly to truth, 722.
- Conversation*, with an eminent philosopher, 352, 353, note.
- Conversion*, to faith and good works, the grand evidence of election, 134. Can be accomplished only by God, 137. Conversion, when taken place on earth, the event immediately known in heaven, 377. A remarkable one, 509. Spiritual, an effect of necessitating grace, 804, 810.
- Co-operation*, Popish doctrine of, 222.
- Cork*, a bishop of, his fulsome adulation of Charles I. and Laud, 65, note.
- Corvinus*, not a stedfast Arminian, 240. Lamented his having been drawn in by that faction, ibid.
- Coverdale*, Dr. Miles, Bishop of Exeter, 164, 193.
- Cowper*, Dr. Thomas, Bishop of Winchester, his high character of Nowell's catechism, 202.
- , the poet, an extract from, 494.
- Coz*, Bishop of Ely, who had been tutor to Edward VI., draws up a paper of advice to Queen Elizabeth, concerning the free-will-men, 205.
- Cranmer*, Archbishop, his gradual advances in divine knowledge, 126. Subscribed to Ponet's catechism, ibid. Was probably concerned in composing that catechism, 127, note. Further evidences of his Calvinism, 129, note. 193, 194. Challenges the whole body of Popish divines, after the accession of Queen Mary, 129. His tender emotions at seeing Ridley and Latimer led to execution, ibid. His new edition of Tyndale's Bible, 193. Two other editions of the Bible, in which he was concerned, 193, 194.
- Craven*, Lord, his distrust of providence, 497.
- Cressy*, the famous battle of, 292.
- Crisp*, Dr., a valuable quotation from, 370, 371, note.
- Cromwell*, Oliver, flattered and over-reached by John Goodwin, 56. Imprisons Mr. Prynne for his loyalty, 256, 257, note. A few thoughts on his character, 194.

D.

Danes, massacre of the, 283.

Davenant, Dr. John, Bishop of Salisbury, asserts unconditional predestination to be a doctrine of the church of England, 226, 254. Maintains the necessary inferability of reprobation from the 17th article, 226. Attends at Dort as a member of the synod, 238. The branch of controversy allotted to him there, 244. Substance of his sermon before Charles I., 253. For which he is called to account, 254. His conversation afterwards with the king, ibid. His view of the necessity of prayer from the certainty of predestination, 714, note.

Davenport, Francis, tries to reconcile the XXXIX articles of the church of England with the decisions of Trent, 265.

David, his sublime taste, 333.

Death, a beautiful consideration thereon, 339, 401, 407. Gradual or sudden, which to be preferred, 491. Of infants, owing to Adam's transgression, 413. A foretaste of it experienced, and found not to be so terrible as was apprehended, 422. A grand remedy against it, ibid. Not to be dreaded, 408. Cannot detain our mortal part, 401. Defined, 807. Why the Romans called it fatum, ibid. The act of God's particular providence, 809, 810. A sudden one granted, 508. The death of Christ absolutely predestinated, 82, 136, 788, note. 803. Intrinsically sufficient for the redemption of all mankind, 142, note. 143.

Deans, enjoined to place Fox's Book of Martyrs in every cathedral, 224.

Debt, national, specified and spiritualized, 448.

Declaration, a remarkable one, published by the Fifth-monarchy-men, 56, note.

—, clerical, of conformity to the Liturgy, when and by whom drawn up, 205.

Decrees, of God, their majesty and efficacy, 84.

Denny, Mr. John, the martyr, 173.

Descurtes, remarkable anecdote of him, 807.

Demis, why styled so, 386. Their fall prior to the creation, 387. Their crime appears to be pride, ibid. Nothing unphilosophical in the scripture account of them, 388. Their creed, 389. Waiting with anxious dread the enunciation of their sentence, ibid.

Dialogue, a smart one, 840—843.

Diary, Mr. Toplady's, 3—28.

Dilemma, a disagreeable one, to which the church of Rome is reduced, 77, note. Another in which James I. found himself, 229.

Directions, concerning preachers, by whom promoted, 248. Severely remarked on by the Protestants of that age, 252, note. Publicly apologized for afterwards, by King James, ibid. Extended and rigorously enforced under Charles the First, 249.

Discriminating grace exemplified, 692.

Diton, Mr. Humphrey, his exalted character of the Stoics, 154.

Divinity of Christ, a strong proof of, 373.

Divine love, the sense of, when greatest, 839.

Doctrines of the church of England, if not preached in a parish church, what is the duty of a member in that case, 878. Perfectly coincident with what the Son of God taught, 341.

Dodd, Dr., an expostulation with him, 874.

Doddridge, Dr., his reflections on equivocating subscription to articles of faith, 276, note. An instance of his resignation, 498. Comfort received by him in distress, on hearing a child read at a door, 836. His observation on the sensible qualities, 826.

Domnis, Anthony de, 272.

Dort, synod of, their wishes for the introduction of episcopacy, 208, note. A succinct history of that celebrated synod, 237—244. Its transactions vindicated, 240. Its decisions solemnly and voluntarily received by the Protestant churches in France, 244. Was one of the most respectable assemblies ever convened, 238. The remarkable oath taken by each member, 239, note. The apartment in which the synod was held, together with the original furniture, is preserved and shewn to this day, 244, note.

Doubts and istresses, what is to be done at those times, 497.

Downes, Mr. Samuel, reflections on a testimony of his, concerning Bucer and Martyr, 148.

Dream, one verified, 510. A remarkable one, ibid. 515. Having a happy effect, 510. A presage of deliverance, 511.

Dutch Confession of faith, openly consented to by the British divines at Dort, 244.

E.

Eagle, Mrs., a good woman, a desire of hers, 500.

Edvard, Dr., his account of the Fifth-monarchy-men, 56, note.

Echo, theory of, 824.

Edgar, his reign, 282. The method he took in clearing England of wolves, ibid. And death, ibid.

Edmund I., his reign, 282. Murdered by a robber, ibid. His burial, ibid.

— II., —, —, 283. Death and burial, ibid.

Edred, his reign and death, 282.

Edward I., his reign, 281. Supposed to have founded the university of Cambridge, ibid. His death, ibid.

— II., his reign, 282. And deathly wound, ibid.

— III., —, —, 283. Cruel treatment to his mother, 284. His death, ibid.

— IV., —, —, 296. Death and character, ibid.

— V., —, —, only three months, 297. Murdered, ibid.

— VI., subscribed to the articles of the church of England, 61. Prefixes a letter of recommendation to Ponet's catechism, ibid. 129. Anecdote of, 499. Part of his dying prayer, 61. His character by Bishop Latimer, 62. By Bishop Bale, ibid. By Bishop Burnet, ibid. By Bishop Montague, ibid. By Carden, 63. By Mr. Guthrie, ibid. His treatise against the Pope's supremacy, 64. Reason why his memory is pecked at by some Arminians, ibid. His account of Bucer's interment, 151. State of the church of England in his reign, 163, 260.

Edwards, Dr., Strictures on Burnet's exposition, 617. —, the late Rev. Mr. Jonathan, his masterly Treatise on Free will, 817, note.

Elizabeth, offered Peter Martyr any preferment he pleased, if he would settle again in England, 152. Ran great risk of her life, during her sister Mary's reign, 191. Protected by Philip for political reasons, 192. Took care to fill the episcopal sees, and especially that of Canterbury, with doctrinal Calvinists, 206. Lamented the too late detection of Bonner's and Gardiner's trick upon Calvin, 207, note. Issues circular letters to the bishops for the relief of Geneva, 211. Very angry with Baro the Pelagian, 213. Her memory grossly traduced by Mr. Wesley, 226. Attended by Whitgift, Bancroft, and Watson, in her last moments, 227. Died in the assurance of faith, ibid. Account of her person and character, ibid. A great admirer of St. Austin, ibid.

England, a list of the kings of, 280.

—, church of, her doctrine concerning grace, 793. Asserts mankind to be not in a state of Arminian liberty, but tied and bound with the chain of sin, 808, note. Holds that God's providence extends to every thing without exception, 818. Mr. Toplady's love and affection to the, 616, 662.

English liberty, what is comprised in the idea of, 394.

Englishman, every true one a constitutionalist, 393.

Epicurus, why reputed an Atheist, 752.

Episcopius, Simon, the Arminian, his gross rudeness to the synod of Dort, 241, 242. The great lenity with which he was treated, 246.

Ethelbald, his reign, 281. His death, ibid.

Ethelbert, —, ibid. —, ibid.

Ethelred, —, ibid. —, ibid.

— II., —, —, 282. And restoration, 283.

Ethelwulph, —, 280. A very conscientious and exemplary prince, 281. His death, ibid.

Ethical preaching, the sad effects of it, 622.

Event, certainty of, by no means preclude the use of means, 330, note.

Evil, not exempt from the decree and providence of God, 148, 196, 201, 274. Moral and penal, not contravened by the doctrine of necessity, 793. Are rather negative than absolutely positive ideas, 844. Voluntarily permitted of God, 744, 813. The divine motives to that permission unsearchable, ibid. 815, 816, note. Natural, considered, 714—716.

Eduy, his reign, 282. And death, ibid.

Egbert, —, 280. —, ibid.

Education, modern, of daughters, 608.

Efficacy of grace, essentially different from compulsion, 95.

Effigy, a suitable one, recommended to the Pope, 77.

Elect, cannot perish, 53, 77, 95, 118, 151, 149, 220, 221. Constitute while on earth a world within a world, 93. Marks by which they are known after conversion, 85, note. An unbroken succession of them in every age, 89. Their number fixed and certain, 692, 693, 747. A curious way of explaining the word, 643.

Election, a branch of predestination, 224. Defined, 225. In what sense admitted by Pelagians and Arminians, 54, 60, 100, 174, 175. The practical improvement of it, 84, 236. Held by the Albigenses and Waldenses, 90. Founded on the sovereignty of God's

INDEX

- will alone, 121. 201. 235. 236. 259. Archbishop Cramer's attestation to it, 129, note. 194. Bishop Ridley's, 130, 182. Bishop Latimer's, 134. How ascertained to ourselves in particular, 168. 181, 182. 184. 195. 198. 199. 225. 226. The root of perseverance, 149, 150. An eternal act of the divine mind, 187. Absolutely unchangeable, 196. (See Perseverance.) Dr. Willet's judicious view of it, 220. Three things to be especially considered in it, 224. Considerations thereon, 312—315. The infallibility of it cannot make men indolent or careless, 680. What the word signifies, 67, 688. To charge it with partiality, is to deny the divine origin of Christianity itself, 758. Appears to take in a vast majority of the human race, 811, note.
- Elements*, the four, commonly so called, not essentially different from each other, 825, 826, note.
- Excellent* passages from eminent persons, classed under their respective heads, 556—607.
- Exchange* of sin and righteousness between Christ and the elect, 140. 172. 175. 190.
- Exhortations*, the use of them, 842.
- Exotic*, Mr. Sellon's curious application of that word to himself, 49.
- Expulsion* of six students from Oxford, considered, 610.
- ## F.
- Fagius*, Paul, accompanies Bucer into England, 147. Made Hebrew Professor at Cambridge, and dies there, 151. His bones dug up and burnt by the Papists, ibid. 218, 219. His just eulogium, ibid.
- Faith*, justification by, that doctrine thundered against by the church of Rome, 70. Remarkable passage in St. Clement for it, 85. Genuine definition of, 146. 154. 221, 222. Distinguished by Dr. Willet into active and passive, 221. A fruit of election, 225. Cannot but produce good works, 118. 128. The gift of God, 186. 221. How it does, and how it does not, justify, 156. 221. Inseparably connected with salvation, 83. 144. The comfort of it may be suspended, 131, note. 144. 177. 179. 198. 221, 222. Assurance of, 441, 442. Faith and fear in believers are very near neighbours, 416.
- Falstaff*, first account of, 295.
- Family* of love, 77—80. (See Ranters.)
- Family Prayer*, for each day in the week, 771—782.
- Fate*, roundly asserted by Wickliff, 102. 103. In what sense admitted by Bradwardin, 110. By St. Austin, ibid. By Boethius, 110, 111. By Peter Martyr, 152. 155. By Milton, 153. And by Melancthon, 270. How maintained by the wisers of the ancients, 109, note. 152. Properly understood it is but another name for providence, 111, note. 153. 155. What the ancients' thoughts were upon it, 716. The etymology of the word, 787, note.
- Fathers*, primitive, Calvin's just observations concerning them, 81, note. General remarks on the study of them, 82. Those of them who lived immediately after the apostles the most to be valued, ibid. Citations from these in behalf of the Calvinistic doctrines, 82—88.
- Fear*, her various masks and methods of accosting the soul, 417, 418. The sure and only deliverance from it, ibid. Fear of dangers sometimes appointed for preservation, 845. A peculiar exemption from, 838. Various fears to which God's people are liable, considered in an excellent Essay on that subject, 416.
- Ferrar*, Dr. Robert, bishop an martyr, 168. Joins in a letter of complaint against the Free-willers, 182.
- Fifth-monarchy-men*, headed by John Goodwin, the Arminian, 56. A mad insurrection of them immediately after the Restoration, ibid., note. Bishop Kennet's just character of them, ibid., note. Two of them executed for treason and murder, ibid., note. The men to whom Messrs. Wesley and Sellon would send us learn the doctrines of the church of England, ibid.
- Five Points*, what religious articles were so called, 238, note.
- Foreigner*, an observation of one, 496.
- Florus Magister*, an excellent writer in the 9th century. His doctrine concerning predestination, 94. And free-will, 95.
- Fine Gentleman*, a modern one, delineated, 607.
- Foreknowledge* of God, infers the infallible futuration of events as strongly as the strongest decree, 746. Infers necessity, 800—802. Susceptible of neither improvement nor mistake, 801. Extends to every thing, ibid., note. See also Omniscience.
- Fortune*, defined, 787. Pedigree of, according to the grosser heathens, 806. Exploded by the wisers ancients, 785, 806.
- Foster and Freze*, a pair of Fifth-Monarchy-men. Titles of two remarkable pamphlets published by them, 56, note.
- Fox*, Mr., the venerable and learned martyrologist, just remarks of his, 119. 164. His Book of Martyrs set up by public authority in every cathedral and parish church in England, 224—226. Specimen of his masterly reasonings on predestination, grace, and free-will, 224—226. His life, 454. His prophecy, 458, 459. A foresight of his departure, 458. His generous liberality, 837.
- Fox*, an old one, tarred and feathered, 762.
- France*, the reformed churches of, publicly approved the doctrines of Dort in a national assembly of the clergy, 244.
- Free Agency*, or Free-will, defined, 786. Perfectly compatible with necessity, 788. A scuffle between Luther and the Pope concerning it, 68, 69. The Pope (Leo X.) excludes from Christian burial such as deny it, 68. Luther denotes eternal malediction on such as maintain it, 69. The doctrine of the church of Rome concerning it, 70. 222. And of the Jesuits in particular, 72. Asserted by Aquinas, 76. St. Austin and Calvin's doctrine one and the same concerning it, 77, note. The judgment of the primitive church concerning it, 81. Denied by Barnabas, 83. By Clement Romanus, 85. By Ignatius, 87. By Polycarp, 88. Whether it had any thing to do in St. Paul's conversion, 99. Summary of Pelagius's reasonings in favour of it, and of Bede's against it, 100. Incompatible (in the Pelagian and Arminian sense of it) with the foreknowledge or omniscience of God, 102, note. 107, note. Utterly inconsistent with prayer and thanksgiving, 113. Has no hand at all in conversion and salvation, 189. Justly repudiated by our old English Protestants as a branch of Popery, 164, 165. 174. 218. 221, 222. Cannot consist with the doctrine of original sin, 186. The holding of it deemed "infamous" and "punishable" in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, 52, note. 60. 204. 205. 223, 224. Its pedigree and offspring, 276, note.
- Free Thoughts* on application to parliament for the abolition of ecclesiastical subscriptions, 300.
- Free-willers*, the first professed Protestants who formed a separation from the church of England, 59. Acknowledge themselves to be, and were considered as, Dissenters from the established church, 51, note. 185. It does not appear that any of them suffered martyrdom for the Protestant religion, 52. 178. Punished with imprisonment in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, 53, note. 60. 205. 223. A congregation of them in London, during Edward's reign, 59. Another in Kent, and a third in Essex, ibid. Complained of to the Privy Council, 60. Seized and forced to give bail for their appearance, ibid. Prosecuted in the Ecclesiastical Court, ibid. Their names registered, for the better security of the public, ibid. Specimen of their tenets, ibid., and 182. 187. Excellent letter of recantation, written by one who was converted from that party, 52—54. St. Austin's address to the ancient ones, 82. Considered as Pharisees by the famous Mr. Careless, 175. A remarkably contentious sect, 177, note. 182. Mr. Philpot's the martyr's bad opinion of them, 177, note. Mr. Bradford's letter against them, 182. More dangerous in his opinion than professed Papists, ibid. Their uncharitable rudeness to Bradford, 183. Their unjust aspersions of predestination, 184, 185. Falsely charged Mr. Philpot the martyr with Antinomianism, ibid. Their frivolous cavils against the church of England, 185. Solemnly disowned by the martyrs, 189. A knot of them give much umbrage in Elizabeth's reign, 203. 223. Remarkable for being virulent defamers of the bishops, 203, note. The Free willers of those times less heterodox, in some respects, than many of our present Arminians, 204. Their numbers exceedingly few in the reigns of Edward and Elizabeth, 59. 205. Free-willers remarkable for being in general very free-livers, 278.
- Free-will* and merit, fairly examined, 352.
- Friendship*, elevated ideas of, 440. Real very scarce.
- Frith*, Mr. John, the martyr, 122.
- Fulk*, Dr. William, his confutation of the Rhemish Testament, with extracts, 222, 223.
- Fuller*, Dr., the historian, his facetious adieu to the Ranters, 79. His character of Bede, 93. And his judicious reflections concerning Wickliff, 103. His remark on the ill effects of Arminianism in England, 232, note. His character of Vorstius, ibid., note. Justly chastises John Goodwin for aspersing the synod of Dort, 238, 239.

G.

Gallican, ancient liturgy, and not Roman, the basis of the present English Common Prayer Book, 125, note.

Gardiner, the Popish bishop of Winchester, his remarks on the homily concerning salvation, 81. Non-pleased by a smart retort, 173. He and Bonner intercept a letter from Calvin, and return him a forged answer, 207, 208, note. Description of his person by Bishop Ponet, 828, 829.

Geneva, present state of the Calvinistic doctrines in that place, 64. The clergy of, released from subscription, by means of Bishop Burnet, ibid. The primitive reformed church of, slandered by a Popish bishop, 183, 184. Her ancient Protestant doctrines the same with those of the church of England, 173, 183, 184. Owned for a sister church in the reigns of Edward and Elizabeth, 211.

Geneva Bible, the translation so called, never authorized by the church or state of England, 193. Yet approved of and recommended by archbishop Parker, 208, 209.

Gifford, William, the Popish priest, instigates assassins to murder Elizabeth, 114, note. Endeavour to parallel Calvinists with Mahometans, ibid.

Gifts, of providence, how to use them, 404.

Gill, Dr., his keen retort to a free-willer, 506. A curious address of his, how to get a good collection at a charity, ibid.

Gloer, Mr. Robert, the martyr, 172.

Gloer, a free-will preacher, imprisoned, 223. Released at the intercession of Lord Burleigh, ibid.

Goard, Dr. Thomas, chaplain to Archbishop Abbot, dispatched by King James to the synod of Dort, 244, note.

God, what he is represented to be, 675, &c. Considered as the father of the whole human race.

God's mindfulness of man, 333.

Goodman, the Arminian Bishop of Gloucester, turns Papist, 75, note.

Goodness of God, moral and praiseworthy, though absolutely necessary, 793.

Good News from heaven, 362.

Goodwin, John, the Arminian, the leader of the Fifth-monarchy-men, 56. Lends his pulpit to Venner, the rebellious cooper, 56, note. Publishes a folio vindication of the regicides, 56, 274. Cajoles Oliver Cromwell, 56. Espouses Cromwell's cause with more outward zeal than any of the other fanatics, ibid. How he escaped hanging, 57. His panic on the Restoration, ibid. Dr. Calamy's character of him, ibid. Remarkable title of Mr. Vicars's pamphlet published against him, ibid. Hieroglyphical embellishments of his picture, ibid. Specimens of his knack at scurrility, ibid. Mr. Howe christens him by the name of the Pa. a preacher, ibid. A slander of his on the synod of Dort refuted by Bishop Hall, 238. Signalized himself as a fanatic preacher during the usurpation, 266. His loyalty contrasted with that of Archbishop Usher, 274.

Goodwin, Dr. Thomas, his remarks upon his nephew's death, 361, note.

Gospel, the, how it differs from the law, 123. Truths of the, ought to be introduced with discretion, 503. And to be preached promiscuously to all men, 705.

Gottschalchus, some account of him, 92. His doctrines, 93. His sufferings, imprisonment, and death, ibid.

Grace, excellent definition of it, 68, 74, 118, 168. Renders itself effectual without violence, 95, 259. Is the alone source of all holiness and salvation from first to last, 81, 87, 95, 128, 171, 172. Can alone render the ministry of the word successful, 137. Cannot be finally lost, 52, 53, 77, 83, 86, 87, 97, 113, 131, 145. Not universal, 220, 221. Scripture instances of its absolute freeness, 225. The Arminian doctrine of it totally incompatible with the goodness of God, 756, 757. Falling from, contrary to sound doctrine, 322. Irresistible or invincible, 638, 639. Internal operation of, absolutely requisite to all holiness of heart and life, 792, 793, 803, note, 817.

Grave, must resign and give back the dead, 340.

Great Bible, what edition so called, 193, 194.

Green, Mr. Bartlett, the martyr, 173.

Greenwood, Mr., a very remarkable anecdote of him and his mother, 501.

Grimshaw, Mr., his great faith, 507.

Grindall, Dr. Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, affirms that the doctrine of the Swiss churches is the same with that of the church of England, 200. Some account of him, 209. Largely assisted Mr. Fox, in compiling the martyrology, ibid. During his exile attended the divinity lectures of Peter Martyr, 210. On his return assists in revising the Liturgy, ibid. His value for Calvin and Zanchy, ibid. His remarks concerning a Tract written by Velsius the free-will-man, ibid. His regard for Beza and for his annotations, 211. His judgment concerning the church of Geneva, ibid. Vindicated from Puritanism, 212. Lord Bacon's opinion of him, ibid.

Grosthed, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, 101, 102.

Grosvenor, Dr., anecdote of, 435. His thoughts of death 505.

Grotius, a remarkable concession of his, 759.

Guise, Dr., a peculiar petition in his prayers, 500.

Gurney, Mr. Thomas, his just and ingenious cure of Mr. Wesley, 278, note.

Guthrie, Mr., the historian, his character of Edward VI., 63. Unjust to the abilities of Wickliff, 103.

H.

Habitation, every man's place of, divinely decreed and fixed, 810.

Hadley, in Suffolk, the inhabitants of that town converted to the gospel, through Mr. Bilney's ministry, 166. The once flourishing state of religion there, ibid.

Hales, Mr. John, of Eaton, his remarks on the audacious rudeness of the Arminians to the synod of Dort, 241—243.

Hali, the Mahometan sect of, free-willers to a man, 115, 116.

Hall, Bishop, an instance of his humility, 102, note. Sent to the synod of Dort, 238. Forced by bad health to return to England, during the session of the synod, and is replaced by Dr. Goard, 244, note. Vindicates the synod many years after, from a slander of John Goodwin, 238.

Hamelton, Mr. Patrick, the martyr, his noble birth, 122. His zeal and magnanimity, ibid. The articles for which he suffered, ibid. Draws the boundary between the law and the gospel, 123. What he delivers concerning faith, ibid. His nervous reasoning against justification by works, ibid.

Hammond, Dr., quoted, 809.

Hampton-court conference, 234—236.

Happiness, intellectual, necessarily connected with virtue, 793. In what true happiness consists, 828, note.

Harold, his reign, 283. And death, ibid.

— 11., his reign, 284. Dies in battle, ibid.

Harington, Lord, his holy life and death, 469.

Harris, the late Dr. William, his objections against the synod of Dort considered, 245, 246.

Hurt, Henry, a wrangling free-willer in the sixteenth century, 177, note. Not owned for a brother Protestant by Mr. Careless, ibid.

—, late Rev. Mr. John, anecdote of, 495. Some fine lines from, 812.

Haukes, Mr. Thomas, the martyr, 171.

Health, what contributes often to impair it, 846.

Heart of man, its total depravity, 409. And cause thereof, ibid.

Heat, our idea of, whence, 824.

Heaven, considered as a place, 350, note.

Helvetic confession. See Switzerland.

Henry, his reign, 285. And death, occasioned by excessive eating, ibid.

Henry II., his reign, 286. Death and interment, 288.

— III., —, 290. Death and burial, ibid.

— IV., —, 294. Circumstances respecting his crown, and death, ibid.

— V., —, 294. His commitment to the King's Bench, ibid. His conquest over the French with an inferior army, and death, 295.

— VI., —, 295. And death, 296.

— VII., —, 298. Institutes the yeomen of the guards, ibid. His death, 299. And character, ibid.

— VIII., his reign, 299. (Left unfinished by Mr. Toplady.) Henry tries Mr. Lambert, the martyr, in person, 120. State of religion in England at his decease, 260. Was once on the point of restoring the Pope's supremacy, ibid, and note. Much delighted with a crafty decision of Melancthon's, 268.

Herney, the late Rev. Mr. James, the elegance and candour with which he foiled Mr. Wesley, 49. Mr. Wesley's indecent and ungrateful return, ibid. One reason of Mr. Wesley's hatred, ibid. His excellent advice to Dr. Wesley, 115, 116. His just character of Dr. Furke's relation of the Rheimish Testament, 222. An observation of his, 375. Absented himself from visiting the great, 501. Anecdote of, 304. An humble

- reply of his, 506. A beautiful and judicious extract from, 666, note. Quoted, 790, note, 797, 811.
- Heylin, Peter, does not disseble the open advances towards Popery in the reign of Charles I., 55, 67. Asperses Wickliff, 103. His account of Mr. Tyndal the martyr, 119. Has a fling at Dr. Barnes, 121. And at Mr. Frith, 122, note. His remarkable concession concerning Ponet's Catechism, 127. Acknowledges with sore ill-will that Peter Martyr had a hand in drawing up the articles of the church of England, 156. His gross self-contradiction relative to Calvin's influence on the English reformation, 159, 160. His remarkable analysis of the 17th article, 192, note. Confesses that reprobation is inferrible from that article, ibid. His remark on a passage in the funeral service, ibid, note. Observable strictures of his, on Nowel's Catechism, 202. Acknowledges the novelty of Arminianism, ibid. His character of Campneys, the free-will-man, 218. Owns the church of England to be a Calvinistic church, 236. Tells a very remarkable and important secret, 252, 253. His attestation to the ancient Calvinism of both the Universities, 261. Confesses the injustice of charging Calvinists with Puritanism, 273. His character, 624, note.
- Higgins, Mr. Peter, his bright assurance, 507.
- Higbed, Mr., the martyr, 167.
- Highwayman, whether he or the cheating tradesman is the honestest person, 884.
- Hincmar (Archbishop of Rheims), his character, 92. A fierce Pelagian, ibid. And an Arian, ibid, note. Persecutes Goteschalvus, 93. His miserable end, ibid.
- Hincmar (Bishop of Laon), nephew to the above Hincmar at Rheims, severely persecuted by his uncle, 92, note.
- Holiness of life, the end and scope of election, 236. Absolutely necessary to salvation, 735. Is secured by election, 735, 736.
- Holy Spirit, his agency ably considered, 337, 338, note.
- Hollis, Mr., a striking account of his sudden death, 852.
- Homicide, an effect of God's secret will, 809.
- Homilies, the first book of, composed by Cranmer and Latimer, 133. Rather practical than doctrinal, according to Ridley's opinion, 130. Highly commended by Bucer, 158. The second book of, when and by whom drawn up, 205. Quotations therefrom, 652.
- Honeywood, Mrs., her case described, 459, 460.
- Hooper, Bishop, 145. His remarkable prediction, 146. Striking instance of his impartiality, ibid. His doctrine of election and grace, ibid. Of justification, ibid. Of providence, ibid. Of perseverance, 147. Scruples for a time to wear the episcopal habit, 157. His scruples obviated by Bucer and Peter Martyr, ibid.
- Hoord, Samuel, a sage argument of his against predestination, 55. Bishop Davenant charges him with apostasy from the church of England, 226.
- Hope, a remark on the Christian grace so called, 83. The generality of men's hopes illusive, 308.
- Hopkins, Bishop, his striking representation of the providence of God, 664.
- Horne, a divine of that name disputes with Velsius, the free-will perfectionist, 78, note. Was probably our English Dr. Horne, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, 210.
- Hurrible Decretum, the sense in which Calvin uses that term, 275.
- Houson, Dr. John, suspended for arminianizing, 260, 261.
- Howe, Mr. Obadiah, writes against John Goodwin, 57.
- Huet, Monsieur, a very remarkable circumstance of, 496.
- Human Nature, the dignity of, contrary to experience, to reason, and scripture, 314; but great, upon Christian principles, 335.
- Hume, Mr., the historian, affirms the Calvinism of all the reformers, both English and foreign, 126. His account of the ill reception which the Arminians first met with in England, ibid. A wish relative to an insinuation of his concerning James I., 228. His illiberal reflections on Bucer, Melancthon, Sturmius, and Draco, 267.
- Hundred and One, propositions condemned by the Bull Unigenitus, a sample of them, 74.
- Huntingdon, Countess of, two anecdotes respecting her, 503.
- Huss, Dr. John, his martyrdom, 95. Some of the articles for which he was put to death, 96, 97. Charged with being a fatalist, ibid.
- Hutton, Dr. Matthew, Archbishop of York, subscribes the Lambeth articles, 214. Advises Whitgift to deal severely with Baro, ibid. Asserts the doctrinal orthodoxy of the Puritans, 272.
- Jacob, his sweet serenity in death described, 424.
- James, St., in what sense he affirms justification by works, 53, 167, 197, 223. His works, and St. Paul's faith, will and must go together, 390. His Epistles not written to counteract St. Paul's writings, 384.
- James I., his account of the Familists, or Ranters, 78. A petition to him from that sect, 79. Summary of his character, 227, 228. Does not appear to have ever revolted from the theological doctrines of Calvin, 228, 268. Political reasons why he countenanced the Arminians in the four last years of his reign, 228, 229, 232, 233. His perplexity on that occasion, 229. Seems to have departed this life at a very critical juncture, ibid. Forewarns the Dutch of the civil and religious confusion which would spring from Arminianism, 230, 232, 233. Violently opposes the promotion of Vorstius, 230. His extreme detestation of Arminius, 230—233. In alarm lest Arminianism should find its way from Holland to England, 231. Earnestly exhorts the Dutch States to extirpate Arminius's disciples, 232, 233. Falls foul on Bertius for having written against final perseverance, 209, 210. Persecuting disposition of this prince, 228, 233. His remarkable dedication of his book against Arminius and Vorstius, 233, 234, and note. Insults the church of England while King of Scotland, 234. Confesses himself a hypocrite of 27 years growth, ibid, note. His unbecoming demeanour during the Hampton-Court conference, ibid. Very properly declines inserting the Lambeth articles into the thirty-nine, 235. Asserts the absolute sovereignty and freeness of election and reprobation, 236. Requests the States of Holland to admit divines from England, and other Protestant countries, to assist at the synod of Dort, 237, 238. The British divines whom he sent thither, ibid. The vehemence with which he interested himself in the synod's condemnation of the Arminians, 239. The several views to which he considered religion as subservient, ibid. Could never entertain a good opinion of Dr. Laud, 247, 248, 272. His reason for not permitting marginal notes to be added to the present translation of the Bible, 247. Confesses himself a symbolizer with Popery, ibid, note. Projects a general toleration of Papists, 248. Occasions him to quarrel with his parliament, ibid. Specimens of his religious inconsistencies, 249. His character by Guthrie and Burnet, 250. Excessively flattered, yet universally despised, 250, 272. Michievous effects of his politics, 250, 251.
- Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres, 71. The labour and exactness with which he studied St. Austin's works, ibid. Narrowly escapes the Inquisition, ibid. Ordains Bellarmine a priest, 72. In some degree a temporizer, ibid, note. His tomb demolished by the Pope's orders, and his memory branded with heresy, ibid, and note. The ferment which the posthumous publication of his work, entitled "Augustinus," raised in the church of Rome, ibid. The contrariety of his system to that of the Jesuits, ibid. His book prohibited by the Inquisition, and condemned by the Pope, ibid. His five propositions, which gave most umbrage to the Romish church, ibid. The formal condemnation of those propositions by Pope Innocent X., 73. Condemned afresh by Alexander VII., ibid. And again, in the present century, by Clement XIII. ibid. A general subscription against them exacted in France, ibid. His writings have probably laid the basis of the Reformation there, ibid.
- Ideas, not innate, 788, 797.
- Idiots, not to be considered as irrational beings, 789, note. An account of one, 500.
- Jekyl, Sir Joseph, 65, note.
- Jennings, Soame, a cursory review of some of his assertions, 439—441.
- Jerom, St., his address to St. Austin, 82. A great admirer of the Stoics, 153.
- Jerom, of Prague, 98.
- Jesuits, their whole system founded on conditional predestination, and works foreseen, 54. Were the immediate fore-runners of Arminius, 55. Remarkable letter written by one of them from England in Charles the First's time, ibid. Claim the merit of being the first planters of Arminianism in this kingdom, ibid. Confess Arminianism to be their "main fabric" and their "sovereign drug," ibid. The remarks of one of them on the state of Protestantism in England under Charles the First, ibid, 66, 67. Procure the condemnation of Jansenius's Augustinus, 72. Were very angry with the synod of Dort, 240.

INDEX.

Jesus seen of angels, considered, 325.
Jewel, Dr. John, the famous Bishop of Salisbury, his doctrine concerning election and perseverance, 206, 207, note. Remarkable passages in a letter of his to Peter Martyr, 230, 231, note. His life, 460.
Ignatius, 86—88.
Immutability, essential to God, 106, 107, 753.
Important remarks, 609.
Inconsistency of Infidels, on what principle to be accounted for, 806.
Independency, essential to God's knowledge, 278. Not a human attribute, 791, 795.
Index Expurgatorius, the Popish, extended to some of Augustine's works, 77, note.
Infants departed, their salvation not to be doubted of, 58, 142, note. The Arminian scheme very unfavourable to them, 58. Baptized or unbaptized, where supposed to be, 645, 646.
Infidelity, promoted by Arminianism, 278. Infidels, their objections not conquerable by Arminian reasonings, 796.
Innocent IV., Pope, menaces Gresthead, 101.
Insensibility, an instance of it, 866.
Intellectual excellencies, God the distributor of them, 792, 797, note.
Interim, some account of a remarkable Popish book so called, 267, note.
Joan, Pope, history of, 766. Not a Pope of Protestant invention, ibid.
John, his reign, 289. His obligation to sign Magna Charta, ibid. His resigning his crown upon his knees, to the Pope's legate, 290; and second resignation thereof, ibid. Death and burial, ibid.
Johnson, Dr. Samuel, his masterly preface to Shakspeare, 81, note. An ornament to the republic of letters, 867. A conversation between him and Mrs. Macaulay, 868. And a droll adventure with him and Osborne the bookseller, 869.
Jones, Mr. Thomas, his last words, 505.
Journey of a Christian, exhibited in a diversity of paths, 404.
Joy in heaven over one repenting sinner, 374.
Ireland, articles of, established in 1615. Extracts from them, 255. Archbishop Laud wished to stifle them, but left the work unaccomplished, 255, 256. Those articles have never been repealed, are still legally in force in that kingdom, ibid.
Isidore of Pelusium, 93.
Judas, was never a true believer, 97. Whether Christ died for him, 142.
Judgment day, certainty of, can be maintained only on necessitarian principles, 795.
Julian, an Italian bishop in the fifth century, artfully varnishes the errors of Pelagius, 54.
Junius, Francis, his commentary on the apocalypse formerly bound up with our English bibles, 197.
Justification, doctrine of the church of Rome concerning it, 70, 221, 222. Denied by Clement Romanus to be of works, 85, 86. And by the Albigenes and Waldenses, 91. And by Wickliff, 103. And by Tyndal, 118. And by Austin, 119. And by Hamelton, 123. And by the church of England, 126. And by Cranmer, and our other reformers, 138—140, 146. Can only accrue to us through the imputed righteousness of Christ, 140. In what sense faith is said to justify, 156, 164, 221, 225. The doctrine of justification by good works, either in whole or in part, absolutely inconsistent with the Christian religion, 165, 167, 197, 271. The Popish doctrine of two justifications considered, 221—223. Absolutely gratuitous, 225. By works, contrary to sound doctrine, 316. Wherein it consists, 649, 656.—See Works.

K.

Kennet, Bishop, his just character of the Fifth-Mo-narchy-men, 56, note.
King, Sir Peter, Lord Chancellor, nonplust by honest Whiston, 216.
Kings, praying ones, 449.
Knight, Mr. Stephen, the martyr, 168.
Knollis, Sir Francis, treasurer of the household to Elizabeth, his letter for the suppression of Castallo's book on free-will, 203. Unravels the Pelagian doctrine of Perfection, 204.
Knowledge, the divine, comprehends all things without exception, 107, 108, 154. Cannot consist with the Arminian idea of human free agency, 107, 108, note. Distinguishable into simple and approbatory, 108. Not founded on things known, 109. Is almighty and infallible, 111. Is founded on predestination, ibid, 154. Utterly incapable of succession and improvement, 109. What it includes, 181.

Knowledge, human, how imbecile even in natural things, 326.

Knox, Mr. John, life of, 451.

L.

LAMBERT, Mr., the martyr, 119, 120. Cranmer concerned in his prosecution, 126, note.
Lambeth Articles, the occasion of them, 213. Why so called, 214. Solemnly approved by the archbishops of both provinces, ibid. Why James the First omitted to incorporate them with the XXXIX Articles already established, 235. Inserted into the articles of Ireland, 255. See also 818.
Latimer, Bishop, his character of Edward VI., 61, 62. His magnanimous behaviour at the stake, 129. Some account of his character and talents, 133. His great respect for Austin, Luther, and Peter Martyr, ibid. Assisted Cranmer in composing the homilies, ibid. His doctrine of election, 133, 134. Of providence, 135. Distinguishes the will of God into secret and revealed, ibid. Avers that God's decreeing will cannot be defeated or disappointed, 136, 143. Affirms the term of human life to be unalterably predestinated, 135. Asserts original sin in its utmost extent, 136. Batters down free-will, 137—141. Declares the necessity and the efficacy of divine grace, 137, 138. Denies justification by works, 138, 139. And asserts justification by Christ's righteousness, 139, 140. His nervous reasonings against sinless perfection, 140, 141. His doctrine concerning the extent of redemption, 141—143. His idea of saving faith, 141. His doctrine concerning perseverance, 143—145.
Laud, Archbishop, why he discouraged the Calvinists, 48. Expunges from a book of Christopher Potter some passages which bore hard on the church of Rome, 66, note. Outwitted by the said Christopher Potter, 67, note. And by the elder Vossius, ibid, note. Was never high in the favour of James I., 246, 272. Made Bishop of St. David's much against that king's mind, 248. The zeal with which he promoted Arminianism, ibid. Flagrant impudence of his measures, 251, 252. Is said to have projected his scheme for re-modelling the church of England at a very early period of life, 251. Openly renounces Calvinism in the first year of Charles's reign, ibid. Was the first Arminian Primate since the Reformation, 252. Would not venture to trust the management of his scheme to a Convocation, 253. Wishes to set aside the Irish articles, and pretends to have compassed his point, but without effect, 255, 256. His injunction to his suffragans, ibid. Would have re-modelled the XXXIX Articles, but for the civil war, 257. His views in obtruding the Romish ceremonies on the church of England, ibid. Was so hardy as to disclaim Arminianism on his trial, ibid. His troubles while a member of the university of Oxford, on a religious account, 251, 261. The difficulty with which he gained his first preferment, 262, 272. At best but a mongrel Protestant, 614.
Law, the moral, how it differs from the gospel, 123. Our own conformity to it cannot justify us before God, ibid. Will not admit or accept of any righteousness which is not absolutely perfect, 140, 176, 194. Christ's righteousness our only possible refuge from its malediction, 140, 141, 197. The ministration of death to those who trust in it, 309. God's inviolable holiness requiring perfect obedience to it, ibid. Christ the fulfiller of the law, 310. The use of the law pointed out, ibid.
Law, Rev. William, a speech of his when dying, 508.
Leaf, Mr. John, the martyr, 178, note. Uncommon instances of his religious zeal and intrepidity, ibid.
Learning, and learned men, extremely hated by fanatics, 60.
Le Clerc, Monsieur, remarkable quotation from, 802, 803, note.
Leo X., his Bull against Luther, 68, 69.
Letter to Mr. John Wesley, on his abridgment of Zanchius, 719.
Letters, a collection of, 829.
Lewis, Mrs. Joyce, the martyr, 177.
Liberty, English, what it is, 394. Religious liberty, of what it consists, ibid.
Life, human, its duration invariably fixed and determined by God's decree, 99, 117, 118, 131, 134, 135, 142, 176. A journey, 402.
Limborch, a shameless assertion of his, 82.
Lindsey, Mr., his reformed liturgy, what, 856. His manner of preaching, &c., 857.
Lithall, examined by Bishop Bonner's chancellor, on the article of justification, 191, note.
Liturgy of the church of England, not borrowed from the Romish form, but from the ancient British and

- Gallican liturgy, 125, note. Corrected by Bucer and Martyr, 148, 159. Reformed at Calvin's request, 160, 161. Suppressed by Mary the First, 191. Restored by Elizabeth, 210.
- Locke, Mr., his idea of compulsion, 95, note. Affirms that voluntariness and necessity are perfectly compatible, ibid. Utterly denies that freedom is predicable of the human will, ibid. His description of precipitate reasoners, 786. His just theory of sensible qualities, 822, 823. His just remarks on the human senses, 829.
- Lollards, or Wickliffites, passage from a letter written by one of them, 114. And from one of their books, 117. A number of them surprised by Henry V. at a religious meeting, 113, 114.
- Love of God to his people, eternal and unchangeable, 53, 97, 131, 144, 176, 180. Love and hatred, how ascribed to God, 738, 744. Love to Christ, a strong declaration of, 507. Theory of the passion of love, 827, 828.
- Love, Mr. Christopher, a prophecy of his, 512.
- Louis XII., of France, a noble answer of his, 92.
- Loyalty, best secured on Calvinistic principles, 274.
- Luther, his spirited remark on the Pope's bull, 69. Denies free-will, and sinless perfection, ibid. Affirms, in his heat, that the maintenance of those two tenets is incompatible with salvation, ibid. His unceremonious language to Pope Leo, ibid. A canon of the council of Trent expressly levelled at him, 70, note. Bishop Latimer's high opinion of him, 133. Compares man's will to a horse, 155. A smart saying of his concerning Henry VIII., 260. His noble integrity, 268. A passage in his will, 507. A design to poison him, 509. An absolute predestinarian, 613. More violent than Calvin, 752, note. A reply of his to Erasmus, respecting the enforcing the doctrine of predestination, 707. His twofold distinction of necessity, 787. Nothing unphilosophical in what he relates concerning apparitions, 789, note. His idea concerning the necessity of grace, 802.
- Lutherans, soon deviated from the purity of Luther's system, 143.
- Lydius, his just remark concerning the crafty perverseness of the Pelagians, 243, note.
- Lytleton, Lord, his remark concerning the Albigenses and Waldenses, 89, note. His character of Cromwell, 850.
- M.
- Maccail, Mr., his triumphant dying words, 502.
- Machines, men are not in the work of conversion, 399.
- Madness, metaphysical theory of, according to Mr. Baxter, 789, 790, note.
- Mahometanism, a compound of Judaism, Christianity, and Heathenism, 115. Specimen of some Christian doctrines and precepts adopted by Mahomet, ibid. Those of the Mahometans who are fatalists are very remote from the Christian doctrine of predestination, 116. A vast body of them are rank Arminians, in points of predestination, grace, free-will, and perseverance, ibid. Several particulars enumerated, wherein the Arminian Mahometans and the Arminian Methodists agree, ibid. Mahometanism unjustly charged on the church of England by Papists and Arminians, 114, note. 128. Queen Elizabeth falsely taxed with it, by Mr. John Wesley, 226.
- Man, degenerated and unrenewed, quite dead to God, and without spiritual sense, 415. An animal made up of matter and spirit, 788. Seems to be naturally wild and uncivilized, 797, note. A nonentity, on Dr. Priestley's and Bishop Berkeley's view of him, 881.
- Manichæism, history and outlines of that system, 813, 814. Enters into the basis of Methodism, 816.
- Manton, Dr., a reproof much blessed to him, 511.
- Marsh, Mr. George, the martyr, 168.
- Martin the Fifth (Pope), his flaming bull against predestination, 67. Orders Wickliff's bones to be dug up and burned, 104.
- Martyr, Dr. Peter, the Reformer, converted by the books of Bucer and Zuinglius, 151. Highly respected by Bishop Latimer, 133. Invited into England by Cramer and Somerset, 147. Made Divinity Professor at Oxford, and why, ibid, and 152. The English Liturgy submitted to his revision, 148. Some account of his life, 151, 152. Refuses Queen Elizabeth's invitation, 152. His doctrine concerning fate, 152, 153. 155. Predestination, 154. Presence, ibid. Providence, 155. Reprobation, ibid. Free-will, ibid. Justification, 156. Perseverance, ibid. Was concerned in framing the book of Articles, ibid. Persuades Bishop Hooper to conform to the episcopal habit, 157. His excellent reasoning on that subject, ibid. Cramer's great opinion of him, 129. His English preferment, 152. He and Bullinger solve Archbishop Grindall's scruples about conformity, 212. Honours rendered to the violated remains of his wife, 219, 220, note.
- Martyrs, for the Protestant religion. Extract from a confession of faith drawn up by eleven very eminent ones, 164. Their Calvinism largely proved, 165—191. Miraculous honours which attended some of them in their last moments, 117, 168, 171, 172. Their number precisely fixed by God's decree, 179. Unanimously disclaim all connection with the Free-will-men, 85. Join in publishing a common confession of their faith, A. D. 1557, 187—189. Part of the prayer usually said by them at the stake, 191. Their zeal and fortitude, 206.
- Mary I., Queen of England, her zeal to rid the two universities of Calvinism, 164. Publishes a proclamation against all books written by the reformers, ibid.
- Mary, Queen of Scots, certain religious particulars which passed at the time of her execution, 217, note.
- Materialism, the system of Atheism, 833. A few thoughts on, ibid.
- Matter, one of the two universal essences, 788, 825, 826, note. Absolutely incapable of feeling or perceiving, 788. Totally dependant on God, 790. Has no effective influence on the divine purposes and operations, and is essentially the same in all bodies, 825, 826, note.
- Matthew, St., reflections on his conversion, 398.
- Matthew's Bible, why so called, 193.
- Maurice de Nassau, Prince of Orange, extricates the United Provinces from the calamities with which the Arminian sect, aided by the Popish, endeavoured to overwhelm that country, 237.
- Means, not superseded, but included, and made effectual by God's decree, 104, 134, 198. Decreed no less than the end, 735, 736, 753. Use of, not made void by necessity, 800, 804.
- Mechanism, See Organization.
- Melancthon, had no hand in the English Reformation, 266. Remarkable particulars concerning him, 267—270.
- Melmoth, Mr., his remark concerning the sensible qualities, 828.
- Melvin, Rev. Mr. John, imprisoned in Newgate for the faith, 191, note.
- Menardus, Hugh, a French Benedictine Monk, his remarkable note on a passage in St. Barnabas, 83, note. Is very angry with that saint for not holding universal redemption, ibid.
- Mendlesham, Protestants expelled from, 173.
- Mercy, what it is in the Deity, 686. Of God, its exercise necessarily limited, 743.
- Merit, of works, asserted by the church of Rome, 70, 71, 76, 222. Jansenius's reason for using the word, 72, note. Disclaimed by St. Austin, 77. And by Clement Romanus, 85. And by Ignatius, 86, 87. And by Polycarp, 88. And by the Albigenses and Waldenses, 90, 91. And by Wickliff, 103. And by Tyndal, 118. And Lambert, 119. And by the English Reformers, 128. Latimer's testimony against it, 139. Utterly inconsistent with the whole Christian system, 117, 119, 123, 138—140. The sense in which some ancient writers use it, 107. Held by the followers of Mahomet, 116. And by Pelagius, 100.
- Merit-mongers, two instances of, 357, 504.
- Messiah, a portrait of, 395.
- Metæors, 519.
- Methodism, defined, 46. Arminianism is the life and soul of it, 278. See Arminianism and Manichæism.
- Millenium, thoughts thereon, 447. The felicity of that state, 428.
- Middleton, Dr. Conyers, his allegorical interpretation of the human fall considered, 815, 816, note.
- Milton, his sublime definition of fate, 153. His poignant reply to Charles II., 495.
- Ministers, like officers in an army, 672. Considered as divided into two bands, 862. Should be supported so as to be separated from unnecessary avocations, 328. Should not dare to temporize in holy things, 341. A curse pronounced on those who do, ibid. A review of a minister's past unfaithfulness, how pungent to himself must the recollection be on a dying bed, exemplified, in two instances, 341, 342, note. An assiduous one, his support when dying, 503. The du-plidity of one, 498, 499. The proper pre-requisites for the ministerial function, 307.

Miracles of Christ, supply an argument in favour of necessity, 800.

Misery, inseparable from vice, 793, 794.

Monarchy, John Goodwin's abhorrence of it, 56, note.

Montesquieu, acknowledges the incompatibility of human free agency with God's omnipotence, 107, 108, note. The manner in which he supposes a Mahometan free-willer to reason on that subject, ibid. The unavoidable alternative to which that train of reasoning reduces the point, ibid.

Moral demeanour ought to be as becometh the gospel of Christ, 351, 352, note. Moral and Political moderation recommended, 392.

Morality defined, 793, note. Not inconsistent with the most absolute necessity, 787, 793.

More, Sir Thomas, Lord Chancellor, supposed saving faith to be in man's own power, 119.

Mosheim, his account of the administration of King Charles I., and Archbishop Laud, 251.

Motion, God the immediate mover of all things, according to the philosophy of Bradwardin, 107. And of Dr. Barns, 121.

Motives, intelligent beings necessarily determined by them, 794, note.

Motto, an excellent one, 837.

Moutin, Monseigneur de, a saying of his, 253, note.

Mountague, Dr. James, bishop of Winchester, his account of Edward VI., 62.

Mountague, Richard, a fiery Arminian, confuted by Bishop Carleton, 245, note. Imprudently exalted to the mitre afterwards by Charles I., ibid. Other particulars concerning him, 252, 253.

Musculus, Wolfgangus, Divinity Professor at Berne, his Common Places translated into English, for the instruction of the clergy and laity, with a Preface by Archbishop Parker, 205.

N.

National Debt, thoughts on, 448. And improvement, 449, 450.

Natural History, a sketch of, 518.

Necessity, perfectly compatible with voluntary choice, or free-agency, 95, note. 111, 743. 748—751. 754. God's foreknowledge cannot be maintained without it, 107, 108, note. Wickliff a strong necessitarian, 102, 103. According to Bradwardin, the divine will is the grand necessitating principle, 109. (See the article Fate.) Whether the human will be exempted from necessity, 111, 112, 118. Christian and philosophical asserted, 784. Signification of the word defined, 426, 787. Etymology of the term, ibid. Distinguished into two sorts, ibid. Has place in the divine nature, 793. Most harmoniously consistent with the morality of action, ibid. The daughter of predestination, 796, note. The doctrine of the Bible at large, 796—800. And of Christ in particular, 800—805. Essential to the happiness of God, 802, note. Life and death entirely governed by it, 808—810. Not a gloomy system, ibid. But the only cheerful scheme of any, 792, 811, 812. Calculated to impress the heart with the love of every christian and moral virtue, ibid. The doctrine of the church of England, 818. God himself a necessary being, 812. The Christian necessity does not supersede the use of rational means, 800, 804, 809, 816, 818. Nor make God the author of sin, 817, 818. Differs from the necessity of the ancient heathens, 806. And from that of the Manicheans, 816. Arminians themselves forced to make necessity their ultimate refuge, 818. General remark on the present rapid progress of doctrinal necessity, 819.

Negro, a speech of one, peculiarly blessed to Lord Craven, 437.

Neighbour, not loving him as ourselves a proof that we are law-breakers, 336.

Newman, Mr. John, the martyr, 170.

Newton, Bishop, acknowledges a doctrinal affinity between the ancient Albigenes and the modern Calvinists, 89. His account of Wickliff, 104.

Newton, Rev. Mr., an extract from, 668, note.

New-Years-day, a meditation for, 427.

Nicene Creed, history of, 428.

Nicholas, Henry, the founder of the familists, or Ranters, 78.

Norfolk and Suffolk, inhabitants of, join in a religious remonstrance against Popery, 191.

Nowell, Dr. Alexander, dean of St. Paul's, some account of him, 202, 203, note. Was probably concerned in drawing up Ponet's catechism, 127. Publishes an improved edition of that catechism, in the reign of Elizabeth, 61. 201. Extracted from by Heylin, 202.

Nowell, Dr., of Oxford, a letter to him, 610.

O.

Obedience of Christ, at once moral and meritorious, and praiseworthy, and necessary, 787, 788, 793. See Righteousness.

Objects, external, supply the soul with all its rudiments of knowledge, 790.

Observations and reflections, under their respective heads, 539—556.

Oliver, Dr., the grace of God powerfully displayed in him, 501, 502.

Omens, considered, not always to be regarded, nor to be constantly despised, 512.

Omniscience of God, 107, 108.

Organization, corporeal, of vast importance to mental exertion, 789, 790, note. 791.

Origin of evil, wrapped up in obscurity, 387.

Original sin, 128, 136. Its effects on the human will, 137, 189, 221, 222. Incompatible with the Popish and Arminian doctrine of free-agency, 186. A hereditary tradition, 315. Christ conceived and born without it, 328. An essay thereon, 409. Admitting the belief of it, answers many objections, 412. Resident in us, 414. Important consequences deducible from the Scripture doctrine of it, ibid. Farther considerations, 654. Could not have taken place without divine permission, 813, 815. The reason of that permission not to be daringly enquired into, 813, 815, 816, note. To deny that our first parents fell necessarily, is to annihilate the divinity of the Christian religion, 813. Dr. Middleton's scheme considered, 815, 816, note.

Orleans, Maid of, an account of her, 295.

Oneral, Dr. John, Dean of St. Paul's, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, frightened by King James, at the Hampton Court conference, 235. Asserts the possibility of total apostasy, and in the same breath denies it, ibid. Very orthodox in the doctrine of election, ibid.

Oxford. See Universities.

P.

Panting after inward conformity to the divine image, a true sign of effectual grace, 403.

Paracelsus, his self opinion, 828.

Paris, Matthew, his character of Bishop Grosthead, 100, note.

Parker, Dr. Matthew, Archbishop of Canterbury, concerned in an edition of the English Bible, 194. Extracts of it, 195. Revises and approves the paper of advice for confining all the free-will-men in one castle, 205. The translation of Musculus's Common Places dedicated to him, and supposed to be prefaced by him, 208. Attests his approbation of the Geneva Bible, in a letter to Secretary Cecil, ibid.

Parkhurst, Bishop of Norwich, concerned in what was called the Bishops' Bible, 194. His opinion of Zanchius, 258.

Passages, excellent ones, or a little abridgement of divinity, selected, for their superior excellency, by Mr. Toplady; they are arranged alphabetically, under their respective subjects, 556—607.

Patriotism, thoughts on, 440.

Paul, St., a remarkable description of his person, 450.

Paul's Cross, London, some account of, 230, 231, note. Arminian books burned there by the command of James I., ibid.

Pearson, Dr. John, Bishop of Chester, remarkable anecdote of, related by Dr. Edwards, 259.

Pelagianism, artfully palliated and qualified by Julian of Eclana, 54. Two of its distinguishing principles, ibid. First ushered in by Arianism, 59. Some more of its constituent branches, 60, 80, 81, note. Bradwardin's account of its progress in the 14th century, 106.

Pelagians. See Free-willers.

Pelagius, summary of his doctrine concerning predestination and free-will, given in his own words, 190. With Beda's refutation of it, paragraph by paragraph, ibid. More concerning him, 81, note. 83.

Perfection, doctrine of, a tenet raked from the dung-hills of Pelagianism and Ranters, 78. Ascribed by Mahometans to Mahomet, 116. Bishop Latimer's testimony against it, 141. Adopted by the church of Rome, 69. Judiciously sifted by Sir Francis Knollis, 203. And by Archbishop Grindall, 211. Doctrine of, flatly contrary to Scripture, 799. A branch of Manichæism, 816.

- Persecution*, on a religious account, utterly inconsistent with every right of human nature, 48, 52, and note. The wrong effect which the cessation of it has had on the zeal and faith of the Protestant churches, 117. Persecutions endured by the Protestants in Holland, at the hand of the first Arminians, 230, 245, 246. Whether the synod of Dort can be said to have persecuted the Arminians, ibid.
- Permission*, not easily distinguishable from design, 741.
- Perseverance* to the end, inseparable from election and faith, 53, 113, 118, 131, 144, 145, 147, 149, 150, 156, 173, 180, 181, 184, 189, 190, 197, 221, 235. Bishop Saunderson's judgment of, 258, 259. Has no tendency to licentiousness, 190. King James the First's exuberant zeal for the doctrine of final perseverance, 230, 231. Asserted by that Prince to be the doctrine of the church of England, 231, 232. Mrs. Rowe's fine view of it, 493, 494. And Dr. Nowell's dark glossary on it, 648, 649. The blessing of it, 639. The gift of God, ibid. The doctrine of it considered, 739, 759. Strictly philosophical, 790, note. An essay on Final Perseverance, 769.
- Persian Mahometans*, follow the free-will system of Hall, 107, note, 115.
- Pharaoh*, Bucer's reflection on the obduration of that Prince, 149.
- Pharisees*, always did and will continue to murmur at the gospel, 376.
- Philip*, King of England and Spain, the probable cause of his preserving the Princess (afterwards Queen) Elizabeth from the axe, 192. Interferes with his consort Mary in behalf of the English Protestants, 206.
- Philip III.*, of Spain, foments Arminianism in the Dutch Provinces, and why, 237.
- Philosophers*, heathen, their notions of fallen spirits, 410. The order in which they seem to have considered the chain of events, 787, note. Utterly unable to account for the origin of evil, 815, 816, note.
- Philosophers*, some modern ones, seem to overlook the agreement of necessity with predestination, 796, note. The odd manner in which three of them lately reasoned, 816, 817, 819.
- Philpot*, Mr. John, the martyr, a remarkable letter of his concerning the Free-willers, 183, note. Another of his concerning that sect, 184. Some account of him, 183. Defies his Popish judges to answer Calvin's Institutions, ibid. Asserts predestination to have been universally held by the Protestant divines, 184. Extracts from some of his letters, ibid. Traduced as an Antinomian by the Free-willers of that age, and why, 186. Appears to have had a hand in revising Ponet's catechism, 201.
- Pia et Catholica Institutio*, a Popish book so entitled, the use Bishop Bonner made of it, 164, note.
- Pilkinton*, Dr. James, Bishop of Durham, preaches a sermon at Cambridge in honour of Bucer and Fagius, 219.
- Pionius*, a primitive christian in the second century, his devout wish, 88.
- Plagiarism*, an instance of it, and how detected, 510. Of Mr. Wesley pointed out, in several extracts, 763—765.
- Plague in London*, during that time a great out-pouring of God's spirit, 497.
- Plurality* of persons in the divine essence considered, 343.
- Poems*, juvenile, 885.
- , in mature years, 908.
- Political* declamation or discussion unfit for the pulpit, 392.
- Polyander*, his remark on the synod of Dort, on the supercilious derision of the Arminians, 241.
- Polycurp*, 88. Extracts from his Epistles to the Philippians, ibid.
- Ponet*, Dr. John, Bishop of Winchester, some account of him, 126, note. See Catechism.
- Poole*, Mr. Edmund, the martyr, 173.
- Pontius Pilate*, an assertor of free-will, 805. For which Christ reprimanded him, ibid.
- Pope*, Mr., quoted, 387, note. 792, 793, 812, 820, 803, note. 807, note.
- Popery*, gross advances towards it in the reign of Charles I., 55. Arminianism the turnpike road to it, ibid. 75, note. 246. (See Arminianism.) Mr. Wesley's lax idea of Popery, ibid, note. Lost much ground during the Marian persecution of Protestants, 206.
- Polinerius*, Launcelot, his testimony concerning the Waldenses, 89.
- Potter*, Christopher, two letters of his to Laud, 65, 66, note. His pains to ingratiate himself with that Prelate, 65. Halts between Calvinism and Arminianism, 66, 67, note. A dexterous trimster, ibid. A remarkable circumstance of him, 496.
- Prayer*, irreconcilable with the Arminian doctrine of free-will, 113. Warranted by predestination, 199. An appointed mean to appointed ends, 809, note. By no means incompatible with predestination, 641, 642.
- Prayers*, for private use, bound up with the Liturgy, 199. A course of, for a family, 771—784.
- Preaching to sinners*, perfectly compatible with the doctrine of predestination, exemplified, 704.
- Predestination*, a doctrine peculiarly offensive to the church of Rome, 68, 70, 74, 218. The Pelagian idea of it, 54, 60, 100, 174. The denial of predestination severely punished by our English reformers, 52, note. 59, 60, 205, 226. Apostatized from at modern Geneva, 232. St. Austin's doctrine of, 77. Judiciously stated by Remigius of Lyons, 94. Held by the church of England, 80, 226, 227, 253, 254. And by the primitive church, 80, 81. Definitions of it, 111, 148, 154, 220, 224, 225. Extends to all things, 149, 154, 225. Has no foundation but the sovereign will of God, 121, 224, 225, 236. Is infallibly effectual, 118. Archbishop Bancroft's method of reasoning upon it, 134, and Mr. Bradford's, 181. How it differs from election, 225. Nothing unjust or arbitrary in the belief of it, 391. Uses and abuses of, 819. The doctrine of, stated and asserted, 687—716. Does not set aside the means, 681. Explained as it relates to all men, 690. Ought to be openly preached and insisted upon, 704. Exemplified, ibid. A clear mirror to see the attributes of God in, 709. Does not annihilate sin, 751, 754. Nor reduce men to machines, 736, 748. Nor clash with the future judgment, 755. Harmonizes with necessity, 796, note.
- Preservation*, divine, the cause of perseverance, 144, 145, 147, 150, 166, 176, 190.
- Prevaricating*, from the grammatical sense of the articles, the tendency thereof, 616.
- Pride*, the parent of discontent, 387.
- Prideaux*, Dr. John, Bishop of Worcester, his memorable speech to James I., 249. Prosecutes Mr. Brydges for Arminianism, 262.
- Priest*, a fat-headed one, 167. Very strenuous against predestination, and in behalf of free-will, ibid.
- Priestley*, Dr., quoted, 793, note. 826. His complete victory over the Doctors Reid, Beattie, and Oswald, 795, note. An unguarded expression of his, 862. His philosophic writings regarded by many Calvinists, 863.
- Prior*, Matthew, a reply of his, 500.
- Prophecy*, affords an irrefragable argument and proof of predestination or necessity, 102, 426, 800, 801. Summary of scripture prophecies, 425.
- Providence of God*, 109, 111, 131, 132, 135, 136, 147, 154, 155, 181, 184, 200. Particular and unlimited, an eminent branch in the Christian system, 349. Its universal agency so as to extend to every thing, 743, 752, 792, 798, 799, 807, note, 810, 811, 818. Its mysteriousness, no just reason for either denying or blaspheming it, 741, 754. Necessity, another name for it, 796, note. Particularly concerned in the birth and death of man, 808—811. And of inferior animals, 810.
- Providential* deliverances, 336. Dispensations, 337.
- Prynne*, William, excluded the House of Commons for his loyalty to Charles I., 256, 257, note. His zeal for the restoration of monarchy, ibid. Accepted of a place under Charles, ibid. Other particulars of him, ibid.
- Pulpits*, at variance with the Desk, 47, 275.
- Puritanism*, falsely charged on the Calvinistic doctrine, 264, 272, 274. Judgment of Archbishop Usher and Bishop Saunderson on this matter, 272, 273.
- Puritans*, ancient, some of them actuated by a very perverse spirit, 212, 277, note. Did not dissent from the doctrines, but from the ceremonies, of the church, 273, 274, 637.
- Q.
- Qualities*, sensible, of matter, what they are, 820. From whence they result, ibid. 822, 823, 825, note. 828. Would be totally reversed, if our organs of perception were oppositely constituted to what they are, 823, 826, 829.
- Quarto-Bible*, published in the reign of Edward VI., 194. Other editions during the reign of Elizabeth, 194—197.
- Query*, concerning a passage in the marriage ceremony, 439.
- Quessel, Pasquier*, sample of the propositions for which he was anathematized by the Pope, 73, 74. His exile, imprisonment, and death, ibid.

Questions and answers, concerning predestination, formerly bound up with our English Bibles, 197—199. Their authority vindicated, 198

R.

- Ramsay, Chevalier, collects the conjectures of the ancients concerning the rise of moral evil, 815, 816, note.
- Randal, Anthony, deprived for Ranterism, 78. A view of his tenets, 79.
- Ranters, a continuation of the Familists, 77. Held that predestination was not absolute, but conditional, 78. Violent advocates for free-will and perfection, ibid, note. Bore a vehement enmity to the Puritans, 79. Their shameless pretences to veneration for the church of England, ibid. Maintained universal grace and redemption, ibid. Dr. Fuller's character of them, ibid. (See more under the article, Fifth-monarchy-men.)
- Redemption, not unlimited, 83, 84, 86, 90—92, 132, 141—143, 150, 180, 221. What redemption really is, 141. Limited, not discouraging, 181. Conditional, a modish tenet, 315. The consequence of such a system, ibid. Not left at uncertainty, 426. A finished work, 644. The extent of, 652. Some very pertinent reflections thereon, 653, 654.
- Refinement, social, not natural to man, 797, note.
- Reflection, on the beginning of the year, 441. Not a source of any new ideas, 788.
- Reformation, at what time it took its rise, 613. At present a sad and awful departure from the principles, 660. The fruit such declension produces, 661.
- Reformers, English, were professed Calvinists in doctrine, 160. Large proof of this, 124—159.
- Regeneration, the work of efficacious grace, 82, 138, 146. An evidence of election, 133, 134. Man unable to contribute any thing towards it, 189. Its priority, 640. Not the effect of human power, 804, 817, 818. See Grace.
- Reinerius, a Popish inquisitor in the twelfth century, his account of the Waldenses, 89, 90.
- Religion of Christ, peculiarly distinguished from every other in one particular, 375, 384.
- Religious ignorance in a person of quality, 502, 507, 511.
- Remarks on peculiar passages of Scripture, Eccles. vii. 16, 434. 1 Cor. xv. 28, ibid. Rom. viii. 4, 435. Rom. ix. 3, 436. 1 Cor. xv. 29, ibid. 1 Cor. xv. 5, ibid. Cart. viii. 14, 437.
- Remigius, Archbishop of Lyons, 93, 94.
- Repentance, the gift of God, 86. A masterly consideration thereof, 374, &c.
- Reprobate, their number fixed and determined, 692.
- Reprobation, denied by the Pelagians, 60, 243, note. Calvin falsely charged with terming it a horrible decree, 275. Peter Martyr's definition of it, 155. Does not make God the author of sin, ibid. 200. A doctrine we are not obliged to wade in, 190. Expressly revealed in Scripture, 150, 194—197, 818. Plainly deducible and implied in the XXXIX Articles, 192, note. 226, 264, 818. And in the homilies, 652. The Arminians at the synod of Dort would fain have put reprobation before election, 242, 243. A doctrine extremely offensive to Pelagians, ibid, note. Bishop Saunderson's view of it, 259. As it respects angels, 742, note. And the ungodly, 697—704. Reprobation of some men most expressly affirmed in Scripture, 745, 747. No ways cruel on the part of God, and why, 702. Not inconsistent with divine justice, 740. Nor with mercy, 743. Nor with the nature of sin, 751. Nor with future judgment, 703. Its equity proved from the inequality of God's providential dispensations, 742. Is rather a negative thing, than a positive, 744. Irreversible, 746. See also 799, 811, note.
- Reproof, to a minister on his remissness, 830, 831.
- Retraction, a model recommended to an Arminian, 52—54.
- Rheims, English Papists at, publish a false translation of the New Testament, with sophistical notes, 222. Confuted by Dr. Folke, ibid.
- Richard I., his reign and crusade to the holy land, 288. His death and interment, 289. His despicable character, ibid. Anecdote of him, 498.
- II., his reign, some traits in his character, 293. His confinement, death, indecent burial, and interment, 294.
- III., his reign, 297. Slain in battle, 298. And interment, ibid.
- Ridicule, no test of truth, 789, 790, note.
- Ridley, Bishop, confessed before his Popish judges, that he assisted in drawing up Ponet's catechism, 126. And that he subscribed it when finished, ibid. Some account of him and his manner of living, 132. His intense study of the scriptures, ibid. His attestation to the Calvinistic doctrine, 131. His profound veneration for Ponet's catechism, and for the articles and homilies, 127. His remarkable kindness to Bonner's mother, 132. The most learned of all our (native) English Reformers, ibid. Writes a defence of predestination in opposition to the free-will-men, 183.
- Righteous, over much, in what respect, 434.
- Righteousness of Christ, the only obedience by which we can be justified before God, 90, 140. Must be carefully distinguished from inherent righteousness, 164.
- Reigns, Mr. John, the first martyr who suffered in the reign of Mary the Bloody, 165. His tranquility just before his execution, 501.
- , Mr. Thomas, publishes an exposition of the XXXIX Articles, 192.
- Rollin, Monsieur, a fine observation from, 666.
- Romaine, Mr., a reply of his, to one under spiritual trouble, 506. Mrs. K., an apposite answer of hers to a clergyman, 505.
- Rome, church of, favoured by Archbishop Laud, 66, note. 67. Exults at the deluge of Arminianism which overflows the church of England, ibid. Thunders against Calvinism, 67—69, 70—74. Struck with alarm at Calvin's design of uniting the Protestants into one body, 207, note. Very angry at the doctrine of absolute predestination, 218, 222. Asserts two justifications, 221, 223. Teaches election upon works foreseen, 22, 223, 225. Peculiarly enraged against the synod of Dort, 240, 241, 247.
- Roth, Mr. Richard, the martyr, 177.
- Rough, Mr. John, the martyr, 177.
- Rovee, Mr. Thomas, some account of, 489, 490.
- , Mrs. Elizabeth, her life and death, 488.
- Rule of human actions, what, 623.

S.

- Saints, in glory know each other, reasons assigned for the assertion, 877.
- Salvation, our own personal knowledge of, by no means presumptuous, 366.
- Samuel, Mr. Robert, the martyr, 172.
- Sapma, the Arminian, his outrageous insolence to the synod of Dort, 243, note.
- Saunders, Mr. Lawrence, the martyr, 165.
- Saunderson, Dr. Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, his opinion of Calvin's institutes, 258. His manner of accounting for the progress of Arminianism, ibid. His idea of election and reprobation, 259. Vindicates the Calvinian doctrines from the charge of puritanism, 274.
- Saville, Sir Henry, in concert with Archbishop Abbott, prints Bradwardin against the Pelagians, 106. Extracts from the preface prefixed by him to that work, 105.
- Sawtree, Mr. William, the martyr, 117.
- Scatiger, Julius, thought himself exquisitely handsome, 828.
- Scepter, probable origin of, 425. When it began to depart, and afterwards actually departed from Judah, 426.
- Self-determination, an attribute inconsistent with the human state, 788, 790, 795. Doctrine of the very essence of Atheism, 791, 806, 818, 819. Incompatible with a judgment to come, 796. Totally antisciptural, 791, 798, 799. Excludes the foreknowledge of God, 800, 801. Tallies with Manichæism, 816. In one respect more enormously absurd than the Manichæan hypothesis, ibid.
- Self-love, 828.
- Sellon, Mr., the capacity in which he serves Mr. Wesley, 47. Very ill qualified for his office, ibid. His shocking disrespect to the Supreme Being, 49. Styles himself an "Exotic," ibid. How he came to wear punnells, ibid, note. His compliments to the Vicar of Broad-Hembury, 50. His address to the same, ibid. A small body of Pelagian divinity, ibid. His title to gentleness of chastisements, 51. Would send us to Goodwin the Ranter to teach us the doctrine of the church of England, 56, note. His high opinion of the said Goodwin, 57. Rather unhappy as a logician, 58. A speculation concerning him, 60. Insults the memory of Edward VI., 61. Confesses his own incompetence to controversy, 64. His blunder concerning Potter, 65, 66, note. A hint to the Pope concerning him, 77. Convicted of Ranterism, 79. Jumps with the church of Rome, 97, 98. Charges our first Re-reformers with Popery and Mahometanism, 124, 127, 128. Unmercifully haunted with certain ghosts, 201, 202. Parson Talbot's petition to him sets him a swearing, 204. Acknowledges the Calvinism of the reformers, 124. And of the church of England, 204. The compliance he passes on the bishops who formed the XXXIX Articles, 205. And on the translators of the present English Bible, ibid., note. Congratulated on his living in the present age, ibid. Deafened to prove the pretended Arminianism of Usher and Davenant, 245, note. Sample of his astonishing ignorance, 272, note.

Semi-Pelagians, no important difference between their system and that of Pelagius, 54, 55.

Sensation, the only source of human ideas, 788, 789.

Senses, defined, 820. Sometimes mislead us, 822, 823. Differently constructed in different persons, 826—828. Admirably fitted, on the whole, to our present state, 829.

Sermons, 307, &c. Sketch of one, 782.

Servetus, his murder justified by Melancthon, 270.

Seton, Alexander, preaches, and renounces the truth, 120, note.

Sheterden, Mr. Nicholas, the martyr, 171.

Shiokh, various significations of, 426. All applicable to Christ, ibid.

Sickness, we no where read that Christ ever experienced it, 327, note.

Sight of Christ, not to be waited for until death, 328.

Sin, the apostle John's definition of, 815. Affirmed by Dr. Watts to be a mere privation, 814. Voluntary, the only cause of any man's condemnation, 746. The permission of it, 192. Adam's sin imputed to his posterity no unreasonable doctrine, 414. A calculation of sins, 449.

Singing of psalms or hymns, a medium of communion with God, 438.

Sinless perfection, leads to Antinomianism, instances of, and the inconsistency of it illustrated, 725, note.

Skellthorpe, a free-willer, converted by Mr. Bradford, the martyr, 183.

Smith, Mr. Robert, the martyr, 171.

Smollett, Dr., ascertains the time when the English Arminians settled into a sect, 229. Accounts for the encouragement latterly given them by James I., ibid.

Snow, contemplation on, 767.

Socinian, what constitutes one, 346.

Solar system, described with remarks, 528.

Solitude, reflections on, 490.

Somerset (Edward Seymour), Duke of, Protector of England, under his nephew, Edward VI., 60, 61. His great veneration for Calvin, 60. An excellent prayer of his, 61. Translates a letter sent to him by Calvin, ibid.

Soul, the immortality of it, 349. Of the believer, the instant it takes its flight, is admitted to the sight and fruition of the Godhead, 339. Of God's own immediate creation and infusion, 848. The alone perceiving principle in man, 788, 823. The vast dependence on the body, during their union, 788, 791. Consciousness and reason, two of its inseparable attributes, 789, note.

South, Dr., a just distinction of his, 67. His opinions of Burnet's Exposition, 617. His conversion from Arminianism, 801, note.

Sovereignty of God, Mrs. Rowe's meditation on it, 493. Its absoluteness acknowledged even by some eminent Arminians, 750, 751, note. See also 792.

Speculation, curious, an immense ocean, not to be launched too far in, 848.

Spicer, Mr. Thomas, the martyr, 173.

Spirit, Holy, the influence of, how believed by a true Christian, 638. The church of England's opinion respecting it, 658.

Spirit and Matter, the only two essences in the universe, 788, 825, note.

Spirits, unembodied, their agency the most probable cause of human madness, 789, note. Their influence on men greater than generally imagined, ibid.

Stephen, his reign, 285. And death, 286.

Stillingfleet, Bishop of Worcester, traces the true origin of our present liturgy, 125, note. His honourable mention of Calvin, 161.

Stoicism, in flying from it the Arminians plunge into the very worst part of it, 103.

Stoics, what the wiser part of them meant by the word fate, 109, 152. Came the nearest to Christianity, both as to doctrines and morals, of any other sect, 153.

Stoning, among the Jews, 450.

Sub-lapsarian principle, what it is, 125, note. The hypothesis adopted by most of our reformers, ibid. Solidly vindicated by Bishop Davenant, 226.

Subscription to the XXXIX Articles. Conversation between two Cambridge divines about, 216. In Bishop Davenant's opinion, every subscriber is bound to maintain the doctrine of reprobation, 226. The terrible effect which is likely to redound from subscribing one way and believing another, 61. The danger which may accrue to the state, from the casuistry of some theological subscribers, 276. Ecclesiastical subscriptions shockingly trifled with, 818.

Suffolk (Catherine Brandon), Duchess of, her tender care of Bucer in his last illness, 151. Her troubles and deliverance, ibid.

Sum of the whole Scripture, a little tract so called, written by Archbishop Cranmer, and formerly bound up with our English Bibles, 194, 195, 199.

Supra-lapsarians, their distinguishing tenets, 125, note.

Supremacy of the Pope, King Edward's treatise against it, 64. The original manuscript of that treatise still in being, ibid.

Sweden, a late King of, his support in the immediate view of death, 496.

Switzerland, churches of, their excellent confession of faith, 199—201. That confession acknowledged by Grindal to harmonize with the doctrine of the church of England, 200.

Sword, a Danish, the antiquity of one, 846.

Sympson, Mr. Cuthbert, the martyr, 178.

— Edward, forced to recant his Arminian sermon, preached at Court, 262.

T.

Talbot, Mr. Thomas, a parson of Milk-street, his memorable petition to Queen Elizabeth's bishops, who he feared would send him to North Wales, or Wallingford Castle, 204. Inferences deducible from that petition, 205.

Taylor, Dr. Rowland, the martyr, 166. Humourously intimidates Bishop Bonner, ibid. The concluding paragraph in his will, ibid. His Calvinism, 167.

Te Deum, history of, 439.

Temptation, proves what it is in the human heart, 329. An instance of an antidote against it, 500.

Thales, the Milesian, his measuring the pyramids, 495.

Theses, sample of, anciently maintained in the two Universities in orthodox times, 262, 263.

Thornhill, Sir James, his life spared by the spoiling of a painting, 497.

Thoughts, on the viith chap. Revelation, ver. 14, 15, 432.

Thunder Storm, reflections on, 768.

Tyndal, Mr. Nicholas, the historian, remarks the approximations to popery in the time of Charles I., 55. Confesses the Calvinism of our church articles, 125.

Token for good, what, 335.

Toplady, Mr., memoirs of him, 1, &c. His birth and descent, 2. An account of his conversion, ibid. His ordination and initiation into the ministry, 3. His recital of God's gracious dealings with him in the course of one year, 3—28. A compressed view of him as a writer and a public speaker, 28, 29. A short review of his publications, 32. A conversation between him and Mr. Burgh, 352, note, and Mr. Whitefield. His curious interview with Mr. Thomas Oliver, 841, 842. A providential escape while preaching, 875, 876. His choice (if consistent with the will of providence) of sudden death, 852. His preaching at Orange-street Chapel, 53. Mr. Wesley and his myrmidons, their base falsehood against him when dying, which occasioned the publication of his dying avowal, 34, 35. A recital by some of his friends, of God's support to him in his immediate view of dissolution, 35, 36. His death and burial, 37. Further malignity of Mr. Wesley after his death towards his memory, 39. Sir Richard Hill's letters to Mr. Wesley on his dastardly conduct, 40. Mr. Toplady's last will and testament, 41, 42. Mr. Fellows's elegy on his death, 42.

Torpedo, its peculiarity, 510.

Tourney, Mr., stopped of his decree at Cambridge, for being an Arminian, 264.

Tremellius, invited to England in the reign of Edward VI., 151. English preferments, ibid. First converted under the ministry of Peter Martyr, ibid.

Trent, Council of, 69—71. Its canons refuted by Calvin, 70, note. Terribly alarmed by Calvin's plan for a coalition of all Protestants, 207, note.

Trew, a noisy free-willer, his idea of predestination, 175.

Turretin, Benedict, said to have been the first successful sower of Arminianism at Geneva, towards the end of the 17th century, 64.
Turretin, John Alpheus, his just character of Calvin, 162. His character of Charles I., 266, note.
Turk, anecdote of a benevolent one, 483.
Tym, Mr. William, the martyr, 173. His ready retort on Bishop Gardiner, ibid. Mr. Careless's letter to him, 175.
Tyndal, Mr. William, the martyr, 117. His doctrines, 118, 119. His translation of the Scriptures revised and re-published by Cranmer, 193.

U.

Unchangeableness of God, essential to his immortality, 810.
Unigenitus, Bull, published against Quesnel by Pope Clement XIII., 74.
Union of Christ, with his church, indissoluble, 87, 97, 118, 172.
United Provinces of Holland, &c., how and at what time reformed from Popery, 237. Forewarned by James I. of the mischief which would ensue from the schism of Arminius, 230, 232. Brought to the verge of ruin by the Arminian faction, 230, 236. Retrieved by the wisdom and heroism of Prince Maurice, 237. States of, their polite liberality to the British divines who sat in the synod of Dort, 244.
Unity of the Godhead considered, 342.
Universal call, would be a mockery on the part of God, 676.
 — infection of our species, the consequence of original transgression, 413.
 — redemption, maintained by the church of Rome, 73. And by the Ranters, 79. Sample of the inseparable difficulties with which the doctrine of universal redemption is clogged, 141—143. Answer to an argument for it drawn from the communion service, 271.
Universities, English, Queen Mary I. labours to purge them of Calvinism, 163, 164. Commanded, after Elizabeth's accession, to place Fox's Martyrology in the hall of each college, 224. Very orthodox in time past, 212, 226, 249, 261, 263. Samples of academical censure inflicted on Arminians, 260—262.
Usher, Archbishop, his account of Gov'eschalus, 92. And of the Waldensian principles, 91. Positively asserts that the Irish articles were not rescinded in the convocation of 1634, 255. Remarkable effects of his ministry at Oxford, 265. His noble testimony against Arminianism, in a sermon before Charles I., 272, 273. Foretold the Civil War, ibid. Saw Charles I. on the scaffold, 274.

V.

Valdo, Peter, a devout person in the 12th century, from whom some suppose the Waldenses to have been denominated, 89.
Valour, a short review of, 439.
Vane, Lady, a patroness of the Protestant martyrs, 184.
Van Harmen. See Arminius.
Vanity, remarkable instances of, 828.
Vaughan, Dr. Richard, Bishop of Bangor, and afterwards of London, concerned in drawing up the Lambeth Articles, 214.
Velsius, Justus, an unruly Pelagian, 78, note. Disputes in favour of free-will, perfection, and falling from grace, ibid. 210. And raises a disturbance in the Dutch church here, ibid. Cited before the ecclesiastical commission, and ordered to depart the kingdom. ibid. A flaming perfectionist, ibid.
Venner, Thomas (the Fifth-monarchy-man), a preaching cooper, in connection with Goodwin, 56, note. Heads a mob of Ranters, and kills a number of innocent persons, ibid., note. Himself and sixteen of his party found guilty of treason and murder, ibid. Blasphemous saying of his, on receiving sentence of death, ibid. Hung, drawn and quartered facing the door of Goodwin's Meeting House, ibid., note. General remark on him, 266.
Veron, Mr. John, chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, defends predestination against Campneys the Free-will man, 218.
Vicars, Mr. John, his humorous attack on John Goodwin, 57. Embarrasses Christopher Potter with a charge of religious instability, 66, note.
Vice, necessary, and yet punishable, 793. Misery its never-failing attendant, 794.
Virtue, does not cease to be such, because necessary, 787, 793. Indissolubly linked with happiness, 794. God the sole inspirer of it, 793, 795. Its exertions distinguished into works morally and evangelically good, 793.

Voluntary, or free agency, 786. Absolutely consistent with necessity, 787.
Vorstius, Conrad, Arminius's pupil, succeeds his tutor in the divinity chair of Leyden, 230. James the First's bad opinion of him, ibid. 232. His writings publicly burned at London, and at the two Universities, 230. The king solicits the States of Holland either to banish him, or burn him, 231—233.
Vossius (John Ger.), his convenient duplicity, 67, note. His Pelagian history new entitled, 94. Seems to have misrepresented Florus Magister, ibid.

W.

Waldenses. Abigenses.
Wales, the Princes of, origin of their motto and coronet, 292.
Walsh, Mr. Thomas, his affecting distress in his illness and peculiar darkness of mind, and last words, 510.
Walsingham, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth, offers large concessions to the Puritans, 277, note.
Warburton, Bishop, his inconsistency, 498.
Ward, Dr. Samuel, Archdeacon of Taunton, one of James the First's commissioners to the synod of Dort, 238. The particular branch of Arminianism which he there set himself to demolish, 244. Remarkable extracts of letters which passed between him and Archbishop Usher, 255, 264, 265.
Warne, Mr. John, the martyr, 169. His memorable confession of faith, 169—171.
Warren, Sir Peter, his courage, 500.
Waterland, Dr., his prejudice and bigotry, 306, note.
Watson, Bishop of Chichester, a memorable hint of his to Queen Elizabeth, in her last moments, 227.
Watts, Dr., some outlines of, 484. Remarkable beautiful lines from, 839. His theory of sin, 814.
Wesalia, John de, his doctrines and sufferings, 98, 99.
Wesley, Mr. John, his implacable rancour against Mr. Hervey's memory, and why, 49. A form of recantation recommended to him, 52—54. Absurdly pleads his old age and labours, 54. Derservedly extolled by some of the Romish Church, 75. Represents Popery as consisting in a mere trifle, ibid., note. Is not quite a Mahometan in the articles of recreations, 116. Various particulars wherein he shakes hands with Mahomet, ibid. A rank harmoniser with the church of Rome, 175, 247. Striking conformity between him and the Pelagians of the sixteenth century, 185, 186. Scared by a host of theological spectres, 201. The sources whence he partly drained his doctrine of perfection, 203, note. An eminent blunder-merchant, 205, note. Congratulated on a certain happy circumstance, ibid. His encomium on Queen Elizabeth, 227. Remark on his mission of lay preachers, 266. Misrepresents the doctrine of the Church of England, 270—272. A word of advice to him, ibid., note. Convicted of a falsehood with regard to Calvin, 274. Some excellent lines concerning him, 278, note. A more substantial account of the Bathing-tub baptism administered by this gentleman, 279. His polemical variations, 733. Asserts justification and salvation by works, 737, note. 761. His dexterous talent at forging, 731, 732, 746. His pair of delectable similes, 747. His shameless plagiarisms, 754, 756. A specimen of presumption and inconsistency, 726, note. 766. Rules for his societies, 726, note. Specimens of his logic, 738, 744, 747, 751. A serious address to him, 761.
Westminster, Assembly of Divines, 818.
Whiston, Mr. William, some remarkable particulars which passed in conversation between him and Sir Joseph Jekyll, 65, note. His anecdotes of one D. Cannon, a professed temporizer, 215. Hampers Lord Chancellor King, on the topic of ecclesiastical subscription, 216.
Whipping, among the Jews, how performed, 450.
Whitefield, Mr. George, a concise character of, 494. An attempt to stone him overruled, 503. Anecdote of, 495.
Whitgift, Dr. John, Archbishop of Canterbury, his high esteem of Nowel's catechism, 201. Character of this prelate, 212. His trouble with Baro the Pelagian, 212—214. His memorable attestation to the Lambeth articles, 214, 216. The politic manner in which he wooed Cambridge of Baro, 215. His veneration of Calvin, 217. Attends Queen Elizabeth when she was expiring, 227.
Whittle, Mr. Thomas, the martyr, 172.
Wickliff, his memory and doctrines anaemized by Pope Martin, 67, 68. His writings the means of converting John Huss, 95. The vast length to which he carried the doctrine of predestination, 102, 103. An absolute denier of merit, ibid. Bishop Newton's

- count of him, 104. His gown and pulpit said to be still preserved at Lutterworth, ibid. Specimen of his translation of the New Testament, ibid., note. Learned from Bradwardin the true doctrine of justification, 106. Lord Cobham's zeal in dispersing his works, 114.
- Wicks, Mrs., her consolation when dying, 506.
- Will of God, the primary and sovereign cause of salvation, 92. 121. 225. The foundation of the divine foreknowledge, 109. 111. 154. 220. 225. Its invincible efficacy, 107. 109. 135. 137. 199. 225. Its absolute sovereignty over the will of man, 101. 200. Necessarily immutable, 109. The basis of fate or providence, ibid., note. Distinguished into secret and revealed, 135.
- Will of man, its natural freedom to evil acknowledged, 112. 221. Absolutely governed by the understanding or intellects, 112. 119. Its spiritual powers denied, 112. 113. 118. 120. 124. 137. 155. 156. 189. 223. 225. Compared by Luther and Martyr to a horse, 155. Undergoes a change in the elect, 200. 222. Is not independent of God, 278. The reconciling it with the grace of God, incompatible and unscriptural, 265.
- William I., his reign, 284. Death and burial, ibid.
 II., ———, 285. Builds Westminster Hall, ibid. Death and burial, ibid.
 III., his view of Providence, 496. An absolute predestinarian, 667.
- Willet, Dr. Andrew, an account of his Synopsis Papismi, with extracts, 220. 222. Reprinted by authority in the reign of Charles I., 258.
- Wilson, Bishop, life of, 481.
- Winston, expulsion of Protestants from, 173.
- Wishart, Mr. George, the martyr, the simplicity of his dress and manners, 214, note. His doctrines, 124.
- Witsius, his excellent dedication of Economia Federum to William III., 81, note. His remark concerning the world of the elect, 93, note. A fine remark of his, 476. His early and deep progress in learning, 471. His conversion, 473.
- Wolsey, Cardinal, his obscure birth and high honours, 299.
- Wolton, Bishop of Exeter, deprives the Rector of Lidford for Ranterism, 78.
- Woman, a poor one, an intrinsic legacy she left to a lady of quality, 497.
- Woodman, Mr. Richard, the martyr, his contest with the Popish Bishop of Chichester, 186. Confutes another Popish doctor in the article of free-will, ibid. Encounters a very fat priest, 187.
- Word and Spirit of God, the two grand stated guides of a christian, 406.
- Work, plenty of, to take notice of every nibbler, 849.
- Works, good, cannot justify us before God, 85. 87. 138. 167. 271. Do not go before, but follow after, justification, 120. 139. 169. 189. 236. Justify us before men, 53. 167. 197. 405. 651. What denominates them such, 320. Almost every sect expecting salvation for them, 385. Good, whether they will add to our future glory, 446. Their use, 385. Under pretence of magnifying faith entirely cast aside, 662.
- World and whole World, how those terms are often to be understood, 63. 88. 92. 142. 316. The absurdity pointed out, when not used in a restricted sense, ibid. May be justly divided into two classes, 408. To be destroyed, and the symptoms of its dissolution, 443. Its censures of and appellations given to new converts, 403, 404.
- Wrangling, in private company, has no good tendency, 502, 503.
- Writers, contemptible ones, a simile from Mr. Addison respecting them, 849.

Y.

- Young, the late Dr. Edward, a remark of his, 82. His reflection on the present state of religion in England, 275. What he was compelled to acknowledge, 664. His inconsistent views of human nature, 797, note. Fine passages from, 821. 825.

Z.

- Zanchius, Jerom, converted under the ministry of Peter Martyr, 151. His arguments in favour of episcopacy, 163, and note. Archbishop Grindal's high opinion of him, 210. And Bishop Parkhurst's, 258. His polite and faithful reprehension of Melancthon, 269. Invited to England to assist in the reformation here, 270. Some account of his life, 669. His clear insight into the doctrines of grace wonderful, 673.
- Zuinglius, Ulricus, the Waldenses apply to him for preachers, 89. His character and magnanimous death, 216, 217, note.

